But the two Tribunes Fuluius, and Manlius, spake against him, and sayd: it was out of all reason, that so young a man should in such manner preasse to haue the office of the highest dignity, against the vse and custome of ROME, before he had passed through the inferior offices of the common wealth. Neuertheless, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voices of the people, who presently pronounced him Consull openly, with Sextius Ælius, although hee was not yet thirty yeare old. Afterwards, Ælius and he deuiding the offices of the state by lot, fell vpon T. Quintius to make warre with Philip king of MACEDON. In the which meane time fortune greatly fauoured the ROMAINS affaires, that made such a man Generall of their warre, to haue pointed a Generall that by force and violence would haue fought all things at the MACEDONIANS hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentlenesse and perswasion then by force and compulsion: it was all against them selues. Philip, to maintaine the brunt of a battell against the ROMAINES, had power enough of his own in his realme of MACEDON, but to make war any long time, to furnish him selfe with money and victuals, to haue places and cities to retire vnto, and lastly, to haue all other necessaries for his men and army: all these did him vpon to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE been pulled from him, the wars against him had not been ended with one battell. Moreouer, GREECE (which neuer before bare the ROMAINS any great good will) would not haue dealt thus inwardly in friendship with them, had not their General been (as he was) a gentle person, courteously, and tractable, that wan them more by his wisedome then by his force, and could boldly and frequently vtter his minde to them, and curteously also heare them speake, that had to doe with him, and chiefly ministred iustice and equity to euery man a like. For it is not to be thought that GREECE would other wise so soone haue withdrawen them selues from the rule of those with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned, and haue put them selues vnder the rule of straungers, but that they saw great iustice and lenity in them. How beit that may more plainly appeare by declaring of his actes. Titus was informed, that the Generalles before him in the warre in MACEDON (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vsed to come thither about the end of the yeare, and made but couild warres and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, and all to take some straight, or to eschew which he thought was not his way to follow their example, nor they tarying so long time the most of their Consulshippe at ROME, in matters of gouernment, and so enioyed the honour of their office. Afterwardes in the end of their yeare, they would resort to the army of intent to get an other yeare ouer their heades in their office, that spending two yeares Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the warres abroad. But Titus bethinking to trifle out the halfe of his Consulshippe at ROME, and the other about Italie, in the warre did willingly leaue all his honors and dignities he might haue enioyed by his office at home, and beseeched the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he tooke with him selfe about three thousand old souldiers of those that had first ouerthrowen Asdruball in SPAINE, & Hannibal afterwards in ITALIE vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serue, and were very willing to go with him in his iourney, to be the strength of his army. With this company he passed the sea without daunger, and landed in EPIRVS, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with army before king Philip, who of long time had lien in campe about the mouth of the riuer of Apsus, to keepe the straight and passage which is the entry into EPIRVS. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the naturall force and hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, and sent him to ROME. Afterwards, him selfe went in person to view and consider the nature of the countrey, which was in this sort. It is a long valley walled on either side with great high mountaines, as those which shut in the valley of Tempe in THESSALY. Howbeit it had no such goodly woods, nor green forrests, nor faire medowes, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had: but it was a great deepe marrishe or quagmyre, through the middest whereof the riuer called Apsus did runne, being in greatnes and swiftnesse of streame, very like to the riuer of Peneus. The riuer did occupy all the ground at the foote of the mountaines, sauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow straight path by the waters side, very vnhandsome for an army to passe that way, though they foũd not a man to keepe the passage. There were some in the army that counselled Titus to fetch a great compasse about by the country of DASSARETIDE, & by the city of LYNCVS, where the country is very plaine, and the way maruellous easie. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lacke victuals, if he stayed farre from the sea, and happely if hee fell into any barren or leane country, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should be constrained in the end to returne againe towarde the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the mountaines to set vpon his enemy, and to proue if he could winne the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the ROMAINES forced to get vp the hils, they were receiued with dartes, slings, and shot, that lighted amongst them here and there: insomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slaine and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the warre. For in the meane time there came certaine neatherds of the countrey vnto Titus (who did vse to keepe beastes on these mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not: by the which they promised to guide his army so, that in three daies at the furthest, they would bring them on the toppe of the mountaine. And because they might be assured that their wordes were true, they said they were sent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the EPIROTS, who loued the ROMAINS very well, yet he fauored them but vnder hand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his Captaines with them, with foure thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen. The heard men that were their guides, went before still, fast bound: and the ROMAINES followed after. All the day time the army rested in thicke woddes, and marched all night by moone light, which was then by good happe at the full. Titus hauing sent these men away, rested all the rest of his campe: sauing that some daies he entertained them with some light skirmishes to occupy the enemy withall. But the same day, when his men that ferched a compasse about, should come vnto the toppe of the mountaine aboue the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he him selfe went on that side of the riuer where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hil. The MACEDONIANS againe, they shot lustely at them from the height of the hill, and in certaine places amongest the rockes they came to the sword. At the selfe same time, the two other troupes on either hand of him did their endeuour likewise to get vp the hill, and as it were enuying one an other, they climed vp with great courage against the sharpe and steepe hanging of the mountaine. When the sunne was vp, they might see a far off as it were, a certain smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mists we see cõmonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could see nothing, because it was behinde them, and that the top of the mountain was possessed with the same. The ROMAINES, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the middest of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they saw it increased stil more and more, and in such sort, that it darkned all the aire: then they did assure them selues it was certainely the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they beganne to cry out, climing vp the hils with such a lusty courage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill still, euen vnto the very rough and hardest places of the moun-

Notwithſtanding, there were not ſlaine aboue two thouſand of them, becauſe the hardneſſe and ſtraightneſſe of the place did ſo gard them, that they could not be chaſed. But the ROMAINES ſpoiled their campe, tooke all that they found in their tents, and ſold ſo their ſlaues, and wanne the paſſage into the mountains, by the which they entred the countrey of EPIRVS: and did paſſe through it ſo quietly, and with ſo great abſtinence, that although they were farre from their ſhips and the ſea, and lacked their ordinary portion of corne which they were wont to haue monthly, and that victuals were very ſcant with them at that time, yet they neuer tooke any thing of the country, though they found great ſtore and plenty of Whereupon Titus looking conſiderately to their doings, gaue his men great charge to paſſe through the countrey without doing any hurt or miſchiefe, as the ſame which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they tarried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly and wiſe forbearing of the country. For, ſo ſoone as they were entred THESSALY, the cities willingly yeelded them ſelues vnto them: and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyong the countrey of THERMOPYLES, did marueilouſly deſire to ſee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put them ſelues into his hands. The ACHANIANS on the other ſide, did renounce the league & alliance they had made with Philip: and furthermore did determine in their counſell, to make warre with him on the ROMAINS ſide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time friends and confederats with the ROMAINS, yet that they did ſhew them ſelues very louing to take their part in theſe wars: neuertheles when they deſired the OPVNTIANS that they would put their city into their hands, and were anſwered that it ſhould be kept and defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but ſued for Titus, and put themſelues and their goods wholly into his protection. They ſay, that

And thoſe alſo that neuer had ſeene Titus before, and came for to ſpeake with him: were compelled in a manner to ſay as much. For where they had heard the MACEDONIANS ſay, that there came a Captaine of the barbarous people that deſtroyed all before him by force of armes, and ſubdued whole countries by violence: they ſayd to the contrary, that they found him a man in deede yong of yeares, howbeit gentle, and curteous to looke vnto, and that ſpake the Greeke tongue excellently well, and was a louer onely of true glory. By reaſon wherof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled al the cities and towns of GREECE with good will towards him, and ſayd: they had ſeene Titus the Captaine, that would reſtore them to their auncient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip ſhewed himſelfe willing to haue peace, and that Titus alſo did offer it him, and the friendſhip of the people of ROME, with theſe conditions: that he would leaue the GRECIANS their whole liberties, remoue his garriſons out of their cities and ſtrong holdes: which Philip refuſed to doe. And thereupon all GREECE, and euen thoſe which fauored Philip, ſayed with one voice: that the ROMAINES were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauor of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GREECE came in, and offered them ſelues vnto Titus without compulſion. And as he paſſed through the countrey of BOEOTIA, without any ſhew at all of wars, the chiefeſt men of the city of THEBES went to meet him: who though they tooke part with the king of MACEDON, becauſe of a priuate man called Brachylles, yet they would honor Titus, as thoſe which were contented to keepe league and friendſhip with either ſide. Titus embraced them, and ſpake very curteouſly vnto them, going on his way faire and ſoftly, entertaining them ſomtime with one matter, and ſomtime with an other, to kept them talke of purpoſe, to the end his ſouldiers being wearied with iornying, might in the meane time take good breath: and ſo marching on by litle and litle, he entred into the city with him. Wherewith the Lordes of THEBES were not greatly pleased, but yet they durst not se him, though he had not at that time any number of souldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he praied audience, and began to perswade the people (as carefully as if he d not had the city already) that they would rather take part with the ROMAINES, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpose, king Attalus being by chaunce at that time in the assembly, did helpe to exhort the THEBANS very earnestly, that they would doe Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeates, for the desire he had (as was imagined) to shewe Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and raise himselfe withall, that he sounded sodainely in the middest of his oration, whereby the veine fell downe so fast vpon him, that it tooke away his senses, so as he fell in a traunce before them all, and few daies after was conueyed againe by sea into ASIA, where he liued a long after. In the meane time, the BOEOTIANS came into the ROMAINES, and tooke their part. And Philip hauing sent Ambassadors to ROME, Titus also sent thither of his men to solicite for him, in two respects. The one, if the warres continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honour, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare least they would send a successor to continue those warres and should take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his friends made such earnest sute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied: neither was there sent any other generall in Titus place, but he still continued his charge in these warres. Wherefore, so soone as he had receiued his commission and authoritie from the Senate, he went straight toward THESSALY, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his armie aboue sixe and twentie thousand fighting men, whereof the ÆTOLIANS made sixe thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen. King Philips armie on the other side was no lesse in number, & they beganne to march one towards the other, vntill at the length they both drew neere the ci-tie of SCOTVSA, where they determined to try the battell. So, neither they nor their men were afraid to see themselues one so neere an other: but rather to the contrarie, the ROMAINES on the one side tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselues what great honour they should winne to ouercome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnes, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other side also, taking the ROMAINES for other manner of souldiers then the PERSIANS, beganne to haue good hope if they might once the field, to make king Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his maister. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stande to it like men, to shew themselues valiant souldiers in this battell, as those which were to shew the proofe of their valiantnesse in the heart of GREECE: the goodliest Theater of the world, and against the enemies of most noble fame. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, those they were both readie to ioyne: did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a litle hill raised vp aboue the rest, and neere the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his souldiers, as all generals doe before they giue battell. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they tooke it for an ill signe that he was seen vpon the toppe of a graue to speake vnto them: he of a conceit at the matter, did of him selfe deferre to giue battell that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowen, the cloudes were turned to a myst, and filled all the valley with a darke grosse thicke aire comming from the mountaines there abouts, which couered the field betwene both campes with a mist all the morning: by reason whereof the skoutes on both sides that were sent to discouer what the enemies did, in very short time, met together, and one gaue charge vpon an other in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon litle hils one before an other, and very neere one vnto an other, which may be bene called so, because they haue had some likenesse of it. In this skirmish there were many chaunges, as commonly falleth out when they fight in such ill fauoured stonie places. For sometime the ROMAINES fled, & the MACEDONIANS chased them: an other time the MA-CEDONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to fly themselues, and the ROMAINES who fled before, now had them in chase. This change and alteration came by sending new [illegible] still from both campes, to relieue them that were distressed and driuen to flie. Now beg[an] mist to breake vp, & the aire to cleare, so that both generals might see about them what done in either campe: by reason wherof both of thē drew on their army to the field & [illegible] So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his armie, which was placed on the [illegible] an hanging hill, from which they came so a maine to set vpon the ROMAINES, & with a furie, that the strongest and valiantest that could be, had neuer bene able to abide the [illegible] their battell, so closely were they ioined together, and their wall of pikes was so strong on his left wing it was not so, because the rancks of his battell could not ioine so neere target to target, the place being betwixt the hils & the rockes where the battell was [illegible] so as they were compelled by reason of the straightnes and vneuennes of the ground to open, and vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disaduantage, went from the [illegible] of his battell which he saw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going forward the left wing of king Philips battell, he set vpon the MACEDONIANS on that side he saw they could not close their rankes in the front, nor ioine them together in the [illegible] the battell (which is the whole strength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) becau[se] field was vp hill and downe hill: and to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind one thronged & ouerlaid an other. For the battell of the MACEDONIANS hath this pro[perty] that so long as the order is kept close and ioined together, it seemeth as it were but the [illegible] a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are sunder[ed] not ioyned together, it doth not only loose the force and power of the whole bodie, but [illegible] euery priuate souldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diuersitie of the weapons [illegible] with they fight, and partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the dispo[sition] ioyning together of their rankes and orders which doth stay vp one an other, more [illegible] euery priuate souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was [illegible] and that they ran their way: one part of the ROMAINES followed the chase, and the o[ther] to giue a charge vppon the flankes of the right wing which fought yet, and they made [illegible] slaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, began to [illegible] & breake, and in the end ranne away as fast as the other did, throwing downe their we[apons] insomuch as there were slaine of them eight thousand in the fielde, and fiue thousand [illegible] prisoners in the chase. And had not the fault beene in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not [illegible] him selfe by flying as he did. For whilest the ROMAINES had their enemies in chase, [illegible] TOLIANS taried, and rifled all king Philips campe, so as they had left the ROMAINES [illegible] to spoyle at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot wordes be[tween] them, and one with an other. But afterwards they angered Titus worse, chalenging [to] nour of this victorie to themselues, because they gaue it out through GREECE, that they had ouerthrowen king Philip in the battell. So that in the songs and ballets the Poets praise of this victorie, which euery countrie and townes man had in his mouth: they put the ÆTOLIANS before the ROMAINES, as in this that followeth, which was [the] song in euery place.

Alcæus verses in disgrace of king Philip.

The Poet was Alcæus that made these verses for to sing, who did them in disgrace [of] Philip, falsely increasing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to [spite] spight him the more: howbeit he spighted Titus therby, more thē Philip, because it was

But Titus tooke it grieuously, who chiefly desired to be honored amongst the GRECIANS, reason wherof from that time forwards he delt in the rest of his matters alone, without ma- account of the ÆTOLIANS: wherewith they were maruellous angry, & specially when ceiued an Ambassador from Philip, and gaue eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offred. then they were so netled against him, that they gaue it out through all GREECE, that Titus sold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the warre, and vtterly haue stroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought GREECE into bondage. ese slanderous reports and false tales which the ÆTOLIANS spread thus abroad, did much uble the ROMAINES friendes and confederates: but Philip selfe pulled this suspition out of ir heads, when he came in person to require peace; and did submit himselfe wholly to the cretion of Titus and the ROMAINES. Titus then graunted him peace, and deliuered to him realme of MACEDON, and commaunded him he should giue ouer all that he helde in REE, and besides, that he should pay one thousande talentes for tribute, taking from him his armie by sea, sauing onely tenne shippes: and for assurance of this peace, he tooke one of sonnes for hostage, whom he sent to ROME. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, and ely did foresee the time to come. For then Hanniball of CARTHAGE (the great enemy of ROMAINES) was banished out of his countrie, and came to king Antiochus, whom he in the head, and earnestly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increase of his Em- Whom Hanniball so followed with these persuasions, that king Antiochus at length was ne to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notable actes, whereby in the warres ore he had attained the surname of great: he began now to aspire to the monarchy of the ole world, & sought how to find occasion to make warres with the ROMAINES. So that if (foreseeing that a far off) had not wisely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus fallen out together with the warres of king Philip, and that these two the mightiest Prin- of the world had ioyned together against the citie of ROME: then it had beene in as great uble and daunger, as euer it was before, in the time of their warres against Hanniball. How- Titus hauing happily thrust in this peace betweene both warres, hee cut off the warre was present, before the other that was comming: by which meanes he tooke from one he kings his last, and from the other his first hope. In the meane time the tenne commis- ners that were sent by the Senate from ROME to Titus, to aide and assist him in the order of affaires of GREECE: did counsell him to set all the rest of GREECE at libertie, and onely to pe in their hands with good garrison, the cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DE- TRIADE, to make sure that by practise they should not enter into league and alliance with iochus. Then the ÆTOLIANS (that were the common slaunderers of Titus proceedings) anne openly to make these cities to rebell, and did summone Titus to loose the chaines of ECE: for so did king Philip call these three cities. Then they asked the GRECIANS in ckery, whether they were willing now to haue heauier fetters on their legges then before, ng somewhat brighter and fairer then those they had bene shackled with: and also whether y were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the fetters from the GRECIANS legs, ying them about their neckes. Titus being maruellously troubled and vexed with this, ued the tenne counsellers so earnestly, that he made them graunt his request in the ende, t those three cities also should be deliuered from garrison: because the GRECIANS thence- th might no more complaine, that his grace and liberalitie was not throughly performed, d accomplished in euery respect on them all. Wherefore, when the feast called Isthmia was me, there were gathered together an infinite multitude of people come to see the sport of games plaied there: for GREECE hauing bene long time troubled with warres, they seeing mselues now in sure peace, & in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, delighted only to see games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by sound of mpet in the assembly, that euery man should keepe silence. That done, the herauld went forward, and thruſt into the middeſt of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloude: that the Senate of ROME, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Conſull of the people of ROME (now that they had ouerthrowen king Philip and the MACEDONIANS in battell) did thenceforth diſcharge from all garriſons, and ſet at liberty from all taxes, ſubſidies, and impoſitions for euer, to liue after their old auncient lawes, and in full libertie: the CORINTHIANS, the LOCRIANS, those of PHOCIDE, thoſe of the Ile of EVBOEA, the ACHAIANS, the PHTHIOTES, the MAGNESIANS, the THESSALIANS, and the PERRHOEBEIANS. At the firſt time of the proclamation all the people could not heare the voice of the herauld, and the moſt part of thoſe that heard him, could not tell directly what hee ſaide: for there ranne vp and downe the ſhewe where the games were plaide, a confuſed brute and tumult of the people that wondred, and asked what the matter ment, ſo as the herauld was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after ſilence made, the herauld putting out his voice farre louder then before did proclaime it in ſuch audible wiſe, that the whole aſſembly heard him: and then roſe there ſuch a loud ſhoute and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the ſound of it was heard to the ſea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were ſet to ſee the Swordplayers play, roſe vp all on their feete, letting the games alone, and went together with great ioy to ſalute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was ſeene (which is much ſpoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that preſent time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the ſhew place at that time that they made the ſame out shout. This came to paſſe, by reaſon the aire was broken and cut a ſunder with the vehemencie and ſtrength of the voices, ſo as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driuen of neceſſitie to fall to the ground, as flying through a voide place where they lacked aire. Vnleſſe I will rather ſay, that it was the violence of the crie, which ſtrooke the birdes paſſing through the aire, as they had beene hit with arrowes, and ſo made them fall downe dead to the earth. It may be alſo, that there was ſome hurling winde in the aire, as we doe ſee ſometime in the ſea, when it riſeth high, and many times turneth about the waues, by violence of the ſtormes. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came about him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly eſcaped from being ſtifled amongeſt them, the people came ſo thicke about him from every place. But after that they were wearie of crying and ſinging about his pauillion vntill night, the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kinne, friendes or citizens, they did kiſſe and embrace one an other for ioy, and ſo ſupped and made merry together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table but of the warres of GREECE, diſcourſing amongeſt them what ſundry great warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their libertie. And yet for all that, they could neuer ſo ioyfully nor more aſſuredly obtaine it, then they did then at that preſent, receiuing the honorableſt reward, & that which deſerued greateſt fame through the worlde: that by the valiantneſſe of ſtraungers who fought for the ſame (without any bloud of their owne in compariſon, or that they loſt the life of any one man, whoſe death they had cauſe to lament) they were ſo reſtored to their auncient freedome and libertie. It is a rare thing amongeſt men, to finde a man very valiant, and wiſe withall: but yet of all ſorts of valiant men, it is harder to finde a iuſt man. For Ageſilaus, Lyſander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to lead an armie to winne the battell, as well by ſea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honeſt benefit, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except those that fell againſt the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iorney of PLATEES, the battell of THERMOPYLES, the battell Cimon fought about Cyprus and vpon the riuer of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GREECE that were made fell out againſt themſelues, and did euer bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumph which euer were ſet vp for the ſame, was to their ſhame and loſſe. So that in the end GREECE was vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowen, and that chiefly through the wickedneſſe and ſelfe will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying an others doing. Which straunge nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to moue them to do it (for that they haue had no great familiaritie with auncient GRECE, and through the counsell and good wisedome of the which, it should seeme very straunge that GRECE could receiue any benefite) haue notwithstanding with dangerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppression and seruitude of violent Lordes and tyrants. This and such like talke, did at that time occupie the GRECIANS heads: and moreouer, the deeds following did answere and performe the wordes of the proclamation. For at one selfe time, Titus sent Lentulus into ASIA, to set the BARGILIANS at libertie, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garrisons out of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was sent also into ASIA, vnto king Antiochus, to speake vnto him to set the GRECIANS at libertie which he kept in subiection. And as for Titus, he went himselfe vnto the citie of CHALCIDE, where he tooke sea, and went into the prouince of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the garrisons of the cities, and redeliuered the gouernment of the common wealth vnto the citizens of the same. Afterwardes when time came that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honour of Hercules, Titus was chosen iudge and rector of the games that were solemnized there: where, after he had set all thinges in very good order, pertaining vnto the solemnitie of the feast, he caused againe solemne proclamation to be made openly, for the generall libertie of all GRECE. Furthermore visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed iustice, and did set the inhabitants and citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amity, and concord one with an other: and did call home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, and pacified al old quarels & dissentions among them. The which did no lesse please & content him, that by perswasions he could bring the GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. Insomuch, as the memory of the libertie which Titus had restored vnto the GRECIANS, seemed vnto them the best part of the goodnesse they had receiued at his handes. They say, that Lycurgus the orator being the collectors of taxes, carie Zenocrates the Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition, which the strangers inhabiting within the city of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, and moreouer prosecuted lawe so hard against them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie they had done vnto so worthy a person. And they tell, how the same Philosopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus children in the citie, said vnto them. I doe well requite your fathers good turne he did mee: for I am the cause that he is praised and commended of euery man, for the kindnesse he shewed on my behalfe. Of the good deeds of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not only reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praised and honored of all the worlde: but they were cause also of increasing their dominions and Empire ouer nations, and that the world afterwardes had great affiance and trust in them, and that most iustly. So that the people and cities did not only receiue the Captaines and gouernors the ROMAINS sent them: but they also went to ROME vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put themselues into their handes. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings and princes also (which were oppressed by other more mighties than themselues) had no other refuge, but to put themselues vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very short time (with the fauour and helpe of the goddes as I am perswaded) all the world came to submit themselues to their obedience, and vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did many more, that he had restored GRECE againe vnto libertie, then in any other seruice or exploit he had euer done. For when he offered vppe vnto the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHOS, the targets of siluer with his owne shield, he made these verses to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth.

Lycurgus the orator, rescued Zenocrates the Philosopher, and saued him from prison.

O noble twynnes Tyndarides, Dan Ioue his children deare:
Throw out loud shoutes of ioy and mirth, reioice and make good cheare.
O noble kings of Spartan soyle, which take delight to ride, Your trampling steedes, with foomy bit, and trappings by their side: Reioice you now, for Titus he, the valiant Romaine Knight, These giftes so great to you hath got, euen by his force and might.

That hauing taken cleane away, from off the Greekish neckes, The heauie yoke of seruitude, which helde them thrall to checkes, Vnto their former libertie, he hath restorde them free, VVhich altogether perisht was, as men might plainely see.

He gaue a crowne of massie gold vnto Apollo, vppon the which he made this inscription to be written.

A valiant Romaine Knight, euen Titus by his name, A captaine worthy by desert, of high renowne and fame:
To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine gold, Hath giuen thy godhead to adorne, with iewels manifold, Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace) VVith fauour to requite this loue, to him and to his race:
That his renowmed fame, and vertue may be spred, And blased through the world so wide, to shew what life he led.

Nero did set Greece at libertie.

So hath the citie of CORINTHE enioyed this good happe, that the GRECIANS haue bin twise proclaimed to be set at libertie: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time, by Nero in our time, and at the selfe same instant when they solemnly kept the feast called Isthmia. Howbeit the first proclamation of their libertie (as we haue told you before) was done by the voice of an herauld: and the second time it was done by Nero himselfe, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open assembly, in the market place of the citie of CORINTHE. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus beganne then a good and iust warre against Nabis the cursed and wicked tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the ende he deceiued the expectation of GREECE. For when he might haue taken him, he would not doe it, but made peace with him, forsaking poore SPARTA vnworthily oppressed with the yoke of bondage: either because he was affraide that if the warre helde on, there should come a successor vnto him from ROME, that should cary the glorie away to end the same: or else he stoode ielous and enuious of the honour they did vnto Philopœmen. Who had shewed himselfe in euery place as excellent a Captaine as euer came in GREECE, and had done notable actes and famous seruice, both of great wisedome, and also of valiantnesse, specially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honored & reuerenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theaters and common assemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruellously offended, for he thought it vnreasonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene general of an armie, but in small little warres against his neighbours, should be as much esteemed and honored, as a Consull of ROME, that was come to make warres for the recouery of the libertie of GREECE. But Titus alleaged reasonable excuse for his doings, saying that he saw very well he could not destroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great losse and miserie of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore, of all the honors the ACHAIANS coulde did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neere any recompence of his honorable and well deseruing, but one onely present they offered him, and which he aboue all the rest most esteemed: and this it was. During the seconde warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had against Hanniball, many ROMAINES were taken prisoners in the sundry battels they lost, and were solde here and there, remained slaues in many countries: and amongest other, there were aboue twelue hundred perished in GREECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did mooue men with pitie and compassion towards them, that saw them in so miserable chaunge and hard fortune. But then much more was their miserie to be pitied, when these captiues found the ROMAINES army, some of them their sonnes, other their brethren, and the rest their kinsmen and friendes, free and conquerours, and themselues slaues and bondmen. It grieued them much to see these poore men in such miserable captiuitie, notwithstanding he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fiue hundred pence a man, and hauing gathered them together into a troupe, they presented all the ROMAINE captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was readie to take shipping to turne into ITALIE: which present made him returne home with greater ioy and contentation, hauing receiued for his noble deedes so honorable a recompence, and worthy of him.

VVby Quintius made peace with Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon.

Twelue hundred Romaines sold for slaues.

The Achaians redeemed the Romaines that were sold for slaues in Greece.

that was so louing a man to his citizens and country. And surely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did most beautifie his triumphe. For those poore redeemed captiues did that, which the slaues are wont to do on that day when they be set at libertie: to wit, they shaue their heades, and do weare litle hats vpon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like manner: and so followed Titus chariet, on the day of his triumphe and entrie made into ROME in the triumphing manner. It was a goodly sight also, to see the spoyles of the enemies, which were caried in the shew of this triumphe: as, store of helmets after the GRECIANS fashion, heapes of targets, shieldes, and pykes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull summe of gold & siluer. For Itanus the historiographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great masse of treasure in niggots of gold, of three thousand seuen hundred and thirtie pound weight, and of siluer, of forty three thousand, two hundred, three score and ten pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips, foureten thousand, fiue hundred, and fourteen, besides the thousand talents king Philip should pay for a raunsome. The which summe, the ROMAINES afterwardes forgaue him, chiefly at Titus sute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of ROME, & his sonne Demetrius to be sent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hostage at ROME. Shortly after, king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GRECE with a great fleete of ships, & a very puissant army, to stirre vp the cities to forsake their league and alliance with the ROMAINES, and make a dissention amongest them. To further this his desire and enterprise, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and secret malice against the ROMAINES, and desired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to say, that the warre which he tooke in hand, was to set the GRECIANS at libertie, whereof they had no neede, because they did already enioy their liberty: but for that they had no iust cause to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he could. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearing greatly the rising of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they sent thither Manius Acilius their generall, & Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS sakes. Which arriuall did more assure them that already bare good will to the ROMAINES; after they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that began to flie out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, remembring them of the friendship & good will they had borne him, euen like a good skilfull Phisitian that could giue his patient Phisicke to preserue him from a contagious disease. Indeede there were some (but few of them) that left him, which were worne and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iust cause of offence towardes them, yet he saued thē after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the country of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, and in great hast tooke the sea to returne into ASIA. And the Consull Manius following his victory, entred into the country of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a prey vnto king Philip. So Philip king of MACEDON on the one side, spoyled & sacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMANIANS, & the AVERANTINES: & the Consull Manius on the other side, destroyed the citie of HERACLEA, and layd siege to the citie of NAVPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Manius taking compasion of them, to see the poore people of GRECE thus spoyled and turned out of all, went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius camp, and there reproued him for suffering king Philip to vsurpe the benefit & rewarde of his honorable victory, still conquering many people, kings, and countries, whilest he continued siege before a citie, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwardes, when they that were besieged on Titus side from their wals, they called him by his name, and held vp their hands vnto him, praying him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto thē, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he spake with Manius, & appeasing his anger, he got him to graunt the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might send Ambassadours to ROME, to see if they could obtaine grace & pardō of the Senate. But the most trouble & difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whō the Cōsull Manius was more grieuously offended, thē with all the rest: because that king Antiochus after the warres was begun, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was past yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old; and being in his extreme age, and in the middest of his warres, he fell in dotage with a young gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleonidamus, the fayrest woman that was at that time in all GRECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their citie into his handes, to serue him in this warre, for a strong and safe retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had lost the battell, he came thither with all possible speede, and taking from thence with him his new singing fayre young Queene which he had maried, and his gold, his siluer and friendes, he tooke the seas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cause the Consull Manius, hauing wonne the battell, did vnarth straight with his army towardes the citie of CHALCIS in a great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwayes lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did so much intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of state and authoritie in counsell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE also. Who, because they were preserued from perill by his meanes, they, to recompence this fact of his, did consecrate vnto him, all their most stately and sumptuous buildings and common workes in the citie, as appeareth yet by the superscriptions remaining to be seene at this day. As in the first place of exercises: The people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this shew place of exercises, vnto Titus & Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: The people of CHALCIDE did consecrate this temple, vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this present time, there is a Priest chosen by the voyce of the people, purposely to do sacrifice vnto Titus: in which sacrifice, after that the thing sacrificed is offered vp, & wine powred vpon it, the people standing by, do sing a song of triumph made in prayse of him. But because it were too long to write it out, we haue onely drawen in briefe the latter end of the same: and this it is.

Honours done vnto T. Quintius for sauing the Chalcidias and the Grecians.

The cleare vnspotted faith, of Romaines we adore, And vow to be their faithfull friends, both now and euermore.
Sing out you Muses nine, to Ioues eternall fame, Sing out the honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy name.
Sing out (I say) the prayse, of Titus and his faith:
By whom you haue preserued bene, from ruine, dole, and death.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone onely honour and reuerence Titus, but he was generally honoured also by the GRECIANS as he deserued, and was maruellously beloued for his curtesie and good nature: which argueth plainly that they did not fainedly honour him, but through compulsion, but euen from the hart. For though there was some iarre betwixt him and Philopœmen as the first about seruice, for emulation of honour, and after betwixt him and Diophanes also, both generals of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare the any malice in his heart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heate of his wordes, in counsell and assemblies, where he vttered his minde franckely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eger of reuenge: but many haue thought him rash, and hasty of nature. Otherwise, he was as good a companion in company as possible could be, and would vse as pleasaunt wise mirth as any man. As when he sayd to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needes vniustly vsurpe the Ile of the ZACYNTHIANS, to driue them from it: my Lordes of ACHAIA, if ye once go out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your selues in daunger, as the torteyses do, when they thrust their heades out of their shell. And at his first time he parled with Philip to treate of peace, whē Philip said vnto him, you haue brought many mē with you, and I am come alone. Indeede it is true you are alone, sayd he, because you haue made all your friendes and kinne to be slaine. An other time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN exiled in ROME, after he had taken in his cuppes in a feast where he was, he disguised himself in womans apparell, and daunced in that manner: & the next day following he went vnto Titus to pray him to helpe him through with his sute, which was, to make the citie of MESSINA rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him aunswere, that he would think vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (sayd he) how you can daunce in womans apparell, and sing at a feast, hauing such matters of weight in your head. In the counsell of the ACHAIANS king Antiochus Ambassadours being come thither, to moue them to breake their league with the ROMAINES, & make alliance with the king their maister, they made a maruellous long discourse

discourse of the great multitude of souldiers that were in their maisters army, and did number them by many diuerse names. Whereunto Titus aunswered, and told how a friend of his hauing bidden him one night to supper, and hauing serued so many dishes of meate to his bord, as he was angry with him for bestowing so great cost vpon him, as wondering how he could so sodainly, get so much store of meate, and of so diuerse kindes. My friend sayd to me againe, that all was but porke dressed so many wayes, & with so sundry sawces. And euē so (quod Titus) my Lordes of ACHAIA, esteeme not king Antiochus army the more, to heare of so many sorts of armes, numbred with their launces, & of such a number of footemen with their pykes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuersly armed, onely with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done these things, and that the warre with Antiochus was ended, he was chosen Censor at ROME, with the son of that same Marcellus, who had bene fiue times Cōsull. This office is of great dignitie, and as a man may say, the crowne of all the honours that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put off the Senate, foure men onely, but they were not famous. They did receiue all into the number of citizens of ROME, that would present themselues to be enrolled in their cōmon regist er: with a prouiso, that they were borne free by father & mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terētius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despight the nobilitie, perswaded the people of ROME to commaunde it so. Now at that time, two of the noblest & most famous men of ROME were great enemies one against another: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus Porcius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefest and worthiest person in the citie: & got the displeasure of the other, which was Cato, by this mishap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing like vnto him in condition at all: for he was so dissolutely & licentiously giuen ouer to his pleasure, that he forgot all comlinesse and honesty. This Lucius loued well a young boy, and caried him alwayes with him whē he went to the warres, or to the charge and gouernement of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day said vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him so well, that he did leaue the sight of the swordplayers at the theatre, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer sene man killed before: to wait vpon him. Lucius being very glad of the boyes wordes, aunswered him straight, thou shalt loose nothing for that my boy, for I will by & by please thee as well. So he cōmaunded a condemned man to be fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whom he willed to strike off his head in the middest of his supper, that the boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the historiographer writeth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Liuius declareth, that in an oration which Cato himselfe made, it was writtē, that it was one of the GAVLES: who being a traitor to his coūtry mē, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his hall, killed him with his owne handes, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howbeit it is very likely that Cato wrote in this sort, to aggrauate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many haue written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an honest gentleman condemned to dye: and among other, Cicero the oratour doth recite it in a booke he made of age, where he made it to be told vnto Catoes own person. Howsoeuer it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and clensing the Senate of all vnworthy persons, he put off the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bene Consull: which disgrace did seeme to redound to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius also. Whereupō both the brethren came weeping with all humilitie before the people, and made a petition that seemed very reasonable and iust: which was that they would commaunde Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly why he had with such open shame defaced so noble a house as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking backe, came with his companion into the market place, where he asked Titus out aloude, if he knew nothing of the supper where such a fact was committed. He aunswered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would deny that he had sayd it not true. Lucius aunswered not a word. Whereupon the people iudged the shame was iustly layd vpon him: and so to honour Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for oration, home vnto his owne house. But Titus being much offended at the disgrace of his brother, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leases, and all deedes of sales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voyde: and caused many sutes also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I can not say he did wisely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemie to an honest man, a good citizen, and duetifull in his office, for his yeare, but vnworthy kinseman, who had iustly deserued the shame layed vpon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the people were assembled in the Theater to see games played, and the Senatours were set according to their custome, in the most honorable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also who in lowly & humble manner went to sit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honour: which whē the people saw, they tooke pity of him, & could not abide to see him thus dishonored. So they cried out to haue him come and sit among other Senatours the Consuls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to turne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition and couetous greedy minde he had of honour was very well taken and esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise the warres, which we haue spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consull, of his owne king he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So he began to stoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the last cast, to beare any longer in the state: they saw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer him in old age to be ouercome with such youthfull violence, being farre vnmeete for any of yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the onely cause that moued him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much disliking and ill opiniō with many. For, after Hannibal fled out of his own countrey, he went first vnto king Antiochus: who, after he lost the battell PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMAINES graunted him peace with such conditions as them list would. Wherefore Hannibal fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered vp and down, at the length he came to the realme of BITHYNIA, and remained there about king Prusias, the ROMAINES knowing it well enough: and because Hannibal was then an old banished mā, of no force nor power, & one whom fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no great reckening of him. But Titus being sent Ambassadour by the Senate, vnto Prusias king of BITHYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieued him to see him aliue. So that notwithstanding Prusias maruellously intreated him, to take pitie vpon Hannibal a poore old man, & his suppliant who came to him for succour: yet he could not perswade Titus to be content he should liue. Hannibal long before had receiued aunswere of his death from an oracle, to this effect.

The land of Lybia, shall couer vnder mowld, The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal vnderstood that of LYBIA, as if he should haue dyed in AFRICKE, and be buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certaine sandy country in BITHYNIA neare to the sea, where there is a litle village called LIBYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually, mistrusting king Prusias faint hart, and fearing the ROMAINES malice also, had made priuy caues and vaultes vnder ground long before, that he might secretly go out at either of them which way he would, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where he did lye, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had wrought Prusias to deliuer him into his hands, he sought then to saue himselfe by those mynes: but found that all the ventes out, had watch and ward vpon them by the kings commaundement. So then he determined to kill himselfe. Now some say, that he wound a linnen towell about his necke, and commaunded one of his men he should set his knee vpon his backe & wayghing hard vpon him, holding the towell fast, he should pull his necke backward all the power and strength he could, and neuer linne presing on him, till he had strangled him. Other say that he drancke bulles bloud, as Midas and Themistocles had done before him. Titus Liuius writeth, that he had poyson which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered in a cup he held in his handes, and before he dranke, he spake these wordes. Come on, let vs deliuer the ROMAINES of this great care, sith my life is so grieuous to them, that they think it too long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shall winne no honorable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient

MANS, who attempted king Pyrrhus their enemy, euen when he made warres with them, and had wonne battels of them, that he should beware of poysoning which was intended towardes him. And this was Hannibal euen he indeed that wrote. The wiues whereof being come to ROME vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violet and cruell, to haue made Hannibal kill himself (in the last extremitie of age) had not Titus done him already, and was as a thirde left [illegible] offered him to vrge him to do it, but a cowardly kinde of honour, for that he would be accounted to be the cause and author of Hannibals death. And then in contrarie wise they did much honour & commend the clemencie & noble minde of Scipio AFRICAN. Who hauing ouercome Hannibal in battell, in AFRICA it selfe, and being then indeed to be feared, and had the neuer ouercome before: yet he did perswade him to be driuen out of his country, neither did ask him of the CARTHAGINIANS that day, nor then, and before the battell, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hannibal curteously by the hand, and after the battell in the conditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hannibals person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his misery. And they tell how afterwardes they met one another together in the citie of EPHESVS, and as they were walking, that Hannibal tooke the elder had on Scipio's right hand, Scipio take it patiently & did not offer not of walking for that neither shewed any countenance of enuie of that king. And in entring into discourse of many matters, they descended at the end to talke of auncient Captaines: & Hannibal gaue his iudgement, that Alexander the great was the first of all Captaines, Pyrrhus the second, & himself the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him what would'st thou say then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truely, quod Hannibal, I would not then put my self in the third rank, but the first, and aboue all the Captaines that euer were. So diuers greatly commending the ghoddy sayings and deedes of Scipio, did marueilously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) layd his handes vpon the death of an old man. Other do the contrary againe say, it was well done of him, saying, that Hannibal so [illegible] he had ouer a fire to the Empire of the ROMANS, which lacked but one to blow it vp: when he was in his best strength and lusty age, it was not his hand nor body that troubled the ROMANS so much, but his great wisedome and skill he had in the warres, and the [illegible] to be base in his hate towardes the ROMANS, which neither yeares, neither age [illegible] with or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine still, but fortune doth [illegible] keepe in a state, but chaungeth still, and then quickeneth vp our desires to set wilfully vpon those that warre against vs, because they hate vs in their harts. The things which [illegible] afterwardes, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, sonne of a daughter of a player vpon the cithern, vnder the fame & [illegible] of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled all ASIA with warre & rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauour. Again Mithridates, after so many losses he had receiued against Sylla & Fimbria, and after so many armies ouerthrowne by battell & warres, and after so many fa[illegible] Captaines lost and killed, did yet recouer againe, and came to be of power both by sea & land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene. For he had a king to his friend, that gaue him entertainement for him and his familie, & made him Admirall of his ships, and generall of his horsemen and footemen in the field. Marius also [illegible] vp and downe AFRICA a begging for his liuing, in so much as his enemies at ROME [illegible] ked him to come: & soone after notwithstanding they fell downe at his feete before him, [illegible] they saw they were whipped, murthered, & slaine within ROME by his cõmandement. [illegible] we see no man can say certainely he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertaintie of [illegible] gs to come: cõsidering there is but one death, & change of better life. Some say also, that Titus did not this act alone, & of his own authoritie: but that he was sent Ambassadour with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hannibal to death, by what meanes soeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not finde any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memorie, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he dyed quietly of a naturall death at home in his country.

THE COMPARISON OF Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopœmen.

T. Quintius benefites vnto Greece.

IT is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore touching the great benefites that came to the GRECIANS, no Philopœmen, nor all the other former Captaines are to be com with Titus. For all the auncient Captaines almost being GRECI made warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a ROMA and no GRECIAN, made warres for the liberty of GREECE. W Philopœmen was not able to helpe his poore citizens distressed and vexed with warres, he sayled away into CRETA. Titus ha ouercome Philip king of MACEDON in battell, did restore to libertie all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And will narrowly examine the battels of either partie: they shall find, that Philopœmen being rall of the ACHAIANS, made more GRECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MA NIANS, fighting with them for the libertie of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfe the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke and so angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left king Philip his realme and cr after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towardes the ÆTOLIANS: where lopœmen for spite, and malice, tooke townes and villages from his owne natiue country citie, wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus co nued a sound friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendship, and done plea vnto: and Philopœmen, in a geare and anger, was ready to take away that he had giuen, a ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopœmen when he had the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwardes rase the wals of their citie, spoiled and destroyed all their country: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernement. meth also by reason of his immoderate choller, he was himselfe cause of his own death, for he made more hast then good speede, to go out of time to set vpon those of MESSINA: and as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisedome, and euer considered what was best to be But if we looke into the number of battels, and victories: the warre which Titus made a Philip was ended with two battels. Whereas Philopœmen in infinite battels in which he the better, neuer left it doubtfull, but that his skill did euer helpe him the more to victory, the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wanne honour by meanes of the power of R when it florished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopœmen made himselfe famous by deedes, when GREECE began to stoupe and fall all together. So that the deedes of the were cõmon to all the ROMAINES: & the deedes of the other, were priuate to himselfe: For Titus was generall ouer good and valiant souldiers, that were already trained to his

and Philopœmen being chosen Generall, did traine his men himselfe, & made them afterwards very expert and valiant, that were but meane and greene souldiers before. And whereas Philopœmen had continuall wars with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it made a certaine proofe of his valiantnesse. For where all other things are answerable to his, there we must iudge that such as ouercome, haue the most courage. Now Philopœmen making warres with the most warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the subtillest of them, by fineneſse and policie: and the most valiant by prowesse and hardinesse. But Titus ouercame, by putting that only in practise, which was already found and stablished: as the discipline of the warres, and order of battell, in the which his souldiers had long before bene trained. Whereas Philopœmen brought into his countrie, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accustomed vnto. So that the chiefest point how to winne a battell, was found out a new, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vse it, and had found it out already before. Againe, touching the valiant actes done in the person of themselues, many notable actes may be tolde of Philopœmen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrarie. For there was one Archedamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, said in his reproche: that at a day of battell, when Philopœmen ran with his sworde in his hand, to that side where he saw the MACEDONIANS fighting, and making head against the enemie, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was busie at his praiers to the gods, not stirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the sword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus euer did, were done alwaies as a Consull, or lieutenant, or a magistrate: whereas Philopœmen shewed himself vnto the ACHAIANS, a man no lesse valiant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a General. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyrant of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSINIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he kept the gates of the citie of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comming in, and therby saued the city from sacking. Thus being borne to command, he knew not onely how to command according to the law, but could commaund the law it selfe vpon necessity, and when the commonwealth required it. For at such a time he would not tary, while the Magistrates which should reuerse him, did giue him authority to commaund, but he tooke it of himselfe, and vsed them when the time serued: esteeming him indeed their Generall, that knew better then they what was to be done, then him whom they chose of themselues. And therefore they do well, that commend Titus actes, for his clemencie, and curtesie, vsed to the GRECIANS: but much more the noble and valiant acts of Philopœmen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much easier to pleasure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and resist the strong. Therefore, sithence we haue throughly examined, and compared the one with the other: it is very harde to iudge altogether the difference that is betwene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement would not seeme very ill, if we doe giue the GRECIAN, for discipline of warre, the preheminence and praise of a good Captaine: and to the ROMAINE, for iustice and clemencie, the name and dignity of a most iust and courteous gentleman.

A Generall must not be at his praiers, when he should occupy his sworde.

The end of Titus Quintius Flaminius life.

Pyrrus kindowred, and beginning of the kingdome of Epirus.

IT is written, that since Noes flood, the first king of the THESPIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phaeton, one of those who with Pelasgus, into the realme of EPIRVS. But some say o that Deucalion, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they h and founded the temple of Dodone, in the country of the Mo ANS. But howsoeuer it was, a great while after that, Neoptole sonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great nũber of people wi conquered the country, and after him left a succession of kings, were called after his name, the Pyrrides: because that from hi cie he was surnamed Pyrrus, as much to say, as redde: and one of his legitimate sonnes he had by Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodes, the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him And this is the cause why Achilles is honored as a god in EPIRVS, being called in the guage, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first kings of that rac the time of Tharrytas, there is no memory nor mention made of them, nor of their pow raigned in the meane time, because they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voide o lity. Tharrytas was indeed the first that beautified the cities of his country with the Gr tongue, brought in ciuil lawes and customes, and made his name famous to the poster followed. This Tharrytas left a sonne called Alcetas, of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arym Troiade his wife, came AEacides, who maried Phthia, the daughter of Menon THESSA a famous man in the time of the warres surnamed Lamiacus, and one that had farre authority then any other of the cõfederats, after Leosthenes. This AEacides had two d by his wife Phthia, to say, Deidamia and Troiade, and one sonne called Pyrrus. In his MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, and put the crowne into the of the sonnes of Neoptolemus. Wherupon all the friends of AEacides that could be take generally murthered, & slaine outright. Androclides & Angelus in the meane time stole Pyrrus, being yet but a suckling babe (whome his enemies neuertheless egerly sought haue destroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few seruant nurses and necessarie women only to looke to the childe, and giue it sucke: by reason w their flight was much hindred, so as they could go no great iorneis, but that they might be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cause they put the childe into the han adroclion, Hippias, and Neander, three lusty young men, whom they trusted with him, and mmaunded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called MEGARES: and y themselues in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by force, made staye of those t followed them till night. So as with much a do hauing driuen them back, they ran after m that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at sunne set. And now, weening y had bene safe, and out of all daunger: they found it cleane contrarie. For when they came the riuer vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they saw it so rough and swift, that it made m afraide to beholde it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpossible to wade ough, it was so sore risen and troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darknesse e night made euery thing seeme fearfull vnto them. So as they now that caried the childe, ught it not good to venter the passage ouer of themselues alone, with the women that ten-the childe: but hearing certaine countrimen on the other side, they prayed and besought m in the name of the gods, that they would helpe them to passe ouer the childe, shewing w vnto them a farre off. But the countrimen by reason of the roaring of the riuer vnder-de them not. Thus they continued a long space, the one crying, the other listning, yet ld they not vnderstand one an other, till at the last one of the company bethought himselfe ill of a peece of the barke of an oke, and vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, hard fortune and necessitie of the childe. Which he tied to a stone to giue it weight, and so w it ouer to the other side of the riuer: other say that he did prick the barke through with point of a dart which he cast ouer. The countrimen on the other side of the riuer, hauing d what was written, and vnderstanding thereby the present danger the childe was in: felled wne trees in all the hast they could possibly, bound them together, and so passed ouer the er. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed ouer, and tooke the childe, was led Achilles: the residue of the countrimen passed ouer also, and tooke the other that came h the childe, and conueyed them ouer as they came first to hand. And thus hauing escaped e hands, by easie iorneis they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they nd in his house sitting by his wife: and laide downe the childe in the middest of the flower ore him. The king hereupon staied a long time without vttering any one word, waihging h himselfe what was best to be done: because of the feare he had of Cassander, a mortall emy of AEacides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke holde of kings gowne, and scrawled vp by that, and so got vp on his feete against the kings knees. e first, the king laughed to see the childe: but after it pitied him again: because the childe ked like an humble suter that came to seeke sanctuarie in his armes. Other say that Pyrrus e not to Glaucias, but vnto the alter of the familiar gods, alongst the which he got vp on s feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods uidence, presently deliuered the childe to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed r to see him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies sent to demaund the ilde of him: and moreouer, Cassander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deer the childe Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but turarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelue yeares olde, brought him into his country of Eys with an army, and stablished him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maiesty his countenance, but yet indeed mor e fearefull then friendly. He had also no teeth in his per iawe that stood distinctly one from an other, but one whole bone throughout his mme, marked a litle at the top onely, with certaine riftes in the place where the teeth should deuided. Men held opinion also, that he did heale them that were sicke of the splene, by crificing a white cocke, and touching the place of the spleene on the left side of them that were sicke, softly with his right foote, they lying on their backes: and there was not so poore or simple a man that craued this remedie of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he crificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleased him very well. They say also that the great oe of his right foote had some secret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they had orne all parts of his body, and consumed it to ashes: his great toe was whole, and had no hurt e all. But of that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was seauenteene yeares of age, thinking himselfe sure enough of his kingdome, it chanced him to make a iorney into ILLY-RIA, where he maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whom he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no sooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe against him, & drawe his friends & seruants, and destroied all his goods, and yeelded themselues vnto his aduersarie Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus lost his kingdome, and seeing himselfe forsaken on all sides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus sonne) that had maried his sister Deidamia, who in her young age was assured to Alexander, the sonne of Alexander the great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius the maried her being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was striken neere to the citie of HIPSVS, where all the kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, & with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valiantest prince amongst them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had lost the battell: Pyrrus neuer forsooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of Grecie which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was sent an hostage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGYPT, where he made Ptolomie know (both in hunting and in other exercises of his person) that he was very strong, harde, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice among all king Ptolomies wiues, was best beloued and esteemed of her husband, both for her vertue and wisedome: he began to entertaine and honour her aboue all the rest. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himselfe towards the great (by whom he might winne benefit) and knew also how to creepe into their credit: and in like manner was he a great scorner and despiser of such as were his inferiours. Moreouer, for that he was found maruellous honorable and of faire condition, he was preferred before all other young princes, to be the husband of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom she had by Phillip, before she was maried vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of that mariage, more and more into estimation and fauour by meanes of his wife Antigona, who shewed herself very vertuous and louing towards him: he found meanes in the end, to get both men & money to returne againe into the realme of EPIRVS, and to conquer it: so was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, because he had both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithstanding, Pyrrus fearing least Neoptolemus would repaire vnto some of the other kings, to seeke aide against him, thought good to make peace with him. Wherupon it was agreed betweene them, that they should both together be kings of EPIRVS. But in processe of time, some of their men secretly made strife againe betweene them, and set them at defiance one with an other: and the chiefest cause as it is said that angered Pyrrus most, grew vpon this. The kings of EPIRVS had an ancient custome of great antiquity, after they had made solemne sacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, in a certaine place in the prouince of MOLOSSIDE, called PASSARON) to take their othe, & to be sworne to the EPIROTES, that they would raigne well and iustly, according to the lawes and ordinances of the countrie; and to receiue the subiects othes interchangeably also, that they would defend and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like maner. This ceremony was done in the presence of both the kings, and they with their friends did both giue and receiue presents each of other. At this meeting and solemnitie, among other, one Gelon a most faithfull seruant and assured friend vnto Neoptolemus, who besides great shewes of friendship and honour he did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two paire of draught oxen, which Myrtilus a cupbearer of Pyrrus being present, and seeing, did craue of his maister. But Pyrrus denyed to giue them vnto him, whereat Myrtilus was very angrie. Gelon perceiuing that Myrtilus was angrie, prayed him to sup with him that night. Now some say, he sought to abuse Myrtilus, because he was faire and young: and began to perswade him after supper to take part with Neoptolemus, and to poison Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he were willing to giue eare to this perswasion, and to be well pleased withall. But in the meane time he went and tolde his maister of it, by whose commaundement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cupbearer, to talke with Gelon about this practise, as though he had also giuen his consent to it, and was willing to be partaker of the enterprise. This did Pyrrus to haue two witnesses, to proue the pretended poysoning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceiued, and

Neoptolemus also with him, both imagining they had cunningly spunne the thred of their treason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not keepe it to himselfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be merry with his sister, he could not keepe it in, but must be prating of it to her, supposing no body had heard him but her selfe, because there was no liuing creature neere them, sauing Pharnaxetta Samons wife, the kings chiefe heardman of all his beasts, and yet she was laide vpon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: so that she seemed as though she had slept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no body mistrusting her the next morning she went to Antigona king Pyrrus wife, and told her euery word what she had heard Neoptolemus say to his sister. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time. But hauing made sacrifice vnto the gods, he bad Neoptolemus to supper to his house, where he slue him, being well informed before of the good will the chiefest men of the realme did beare him, who wished him to dispatche Neoptolemus, and not to content himselfe with a peece of EPIRVS only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cause therefore, this suspition falling out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus, and slue him first. And furthermore, remébring the pleasures he had receiued of Ptolomie and Berenice, he named his first sonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and hauing built a city in the PRESCQVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined with himselfe how to winne that which lay neerest vnto him: and so tooke occasion by this meanes, first to set foote into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldest sonne of Cassander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Thessalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne country, who sent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus also to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not so quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arriued there, demaunded for his charge susteined, the citie of NYMPHEA, with all the sea coastes of MACEDON: and besides all that, certaine landes also that were not belonging to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kings of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All these, the young king Alexander hauing vnto him, he tooke possession thereof, and put good garrisons into the same in his owne name: and conquering the rest of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great distresse. In the meane time king Lysimachus lacked no good will to helpe Antipater with his force, but being busied in other matters, had not the meane to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleasures he had receiued of Ptolomie, would denie him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leaue off the warres begun against Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the summe of three hundred talents. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew straight that this was but a fetche and deuise of Lysimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vsed at the beginning of his letters, was not in them obserued: To my sonne Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeit was, king Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: neuertheless, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworne vpon the sacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beasts brought to be sacrificed, a goate, a bull, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of himselfe before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughing. But there was a Soothsaier, one Theodotus, that perswaded Pyrrus not to sweare: saying, that this signe and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings with sodaine death. For which cause Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres being ended, Demetrius notwithstanding came to him, knowing well enough at his coming that Alexander had no more neede of his aide, and that he did it onely but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but the one began to mistrust the other, and to spie all the wayes they could to intrap each other: but Demetrius embracing the first occasion offered, preuented Alexander, and slue him, being a young man, and proclaimed himselfe king of MACEDON in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before against Pyrrus, because he had ouerrun the country of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy couetousnesse to haue the more (which is a common vice with princes and noble men) made, that being so neere neighbours, the one stoode in feare and mistrust of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betweene them, and were to make diuision of one selfe kingdome. Now Hay began the matter and occasion of quarrell, to grow the greater betweene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his armie to set vpon the AETOLIANS, and hauing conquered the country, left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there with a great armie: and himselfe in person in the meane time, marched against Pyrrus, and Pyrrus against him other side against him. They both missed of meeting, and Demetrius going on further on one side, entred into the realme of EPIRVS, and brought a great spoile away with him. Pyrrus on the other side marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gaue battell, and it was valiantly fought out betweene the souldiers of either party, but especially betweene the two Generals. For doubtlesse, Pantauchus was the valiantest Captaine, stoutest man, and of the greatest experience in armes, of all the Captaines and souldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus trusting in his strength and courage, aduanced himself forwards, and lustely chalenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other side being inferior to no king in valiantesse, nor in desire to win honour, as he that would ascribe vnto himself the glory of Achilles, more for the imitation of his valiancie, then for that he was descended of his bloud: passed through the middest of the battell vnto the first rancke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one an other, first with their dartes, and then coming nearer, fought with their swords, not only artificially, but also with great force and furie: vntill such time as Pyrrus was hurte in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two. The one neere vnto his throte and the other in his legge: so as in the ende Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground, but neuertheless killed him not. For, so soone as he was downe, his men tooke him, and caried him away. But the EPIROTES encoraged by the victorie of their king, and the admiration of his valiantnesse, stuck too it so lustily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: & hauing put them to flight, followed them so liuely, that they slue a great number of them, and tooke fiue thousand prisoners. This ouerthrowe did not so much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the losse they had receiued, nor with the hate conceiued against Pyrrus: as it wanne Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantnesse to be wondred at of all such as were present at the battell that saw him fight, and how he laide about him. For they thought that they saw in his face the very life and agilitie of Alexander the great, and the right shadowe as it were shewing the force and fury of Alexander himselfe in that fight. And where other kings do onely counterfeit Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of souldiers and gardes about their persons, and in a certaine fashion and bowing of their necks a litle, and vttering his speech with an high voice: Pyrrus onely was like vnto him, and followed him in his marshall deeds and valiant actes. Furthermore, for his experience and skill in warlike discipline, the bookes he wrote himselfe thereof, doe amply prooue and make manifest. Furthermore, they reporte, that king Antigonus being asked, whome he thought to be the greatest Captaine: made aunswer, Pyrrus, so farre forth as he might liue to be olde, speaking only of the captaines of his time. But Hanniball generally said, Pyrrus was the greatest Captaine of experience and skill in warres of all other, Scipio the second, and himselfe the third: as we haue written in the life of Scipio. So it seemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and studie to the discipline of warres, as that which indeed was princely and meete for a king, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that hauing at a feast one day, a question was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of flute, Python or Cephesias: whereunto he aunswered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best Captaine, as if he would haue said, that was the onely thing a prince should seeke for, which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle & familiar with his friends, easie to forgiue when any had offended him, and maruellous desirous to requite and acknowledge any curtesie or pleasure by him receiued. And that was the cause why he did very patiently take the death of AEropus, not so much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to euery liuing creature) as for that he was angry with himselfe he had deferred the so long that time it selfe had cut him off from all occasion and meanes to requite the curtesies he had receiued of him. True it is that money lent, may be repaied againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it grieueth an honest nature, when he can not recompence the good will of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the good turne. Another time Pyrrus being in the city of AMBRACIA, there were certain of his friends that gaue him counsel to put a naughty man out of the city, that did nothing but speake ill of him. But he aunswered, it is better (quoth he) to keepe him here still, speaking ill of vs but to a few: then driuing him away, to make him speake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youths were brought before him on a time, who making merry together, drinking freely, were bold with the king to speake their pleasure of him in very vnduetifull sort. So, Pyrrus asking them whether it was true they sayed so or no: it is true, and it please your grace, sayed one of them, we sayed it in deede; and had not our wine failed vs, we had spoken a great deale more. The king laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, hee maried many wiues to encrease his power withall, and to get more friendes. For hee maried the daughter of Autoleon king of PAEONIA, and Birrenna the daughter of Bardillis, king of ILLYRIA: and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of SYRACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of GORPHVE, which her father had taken. By Antigona his first wife, he had a sonne called Ptolomie: By Lanassa, an other called Alexander: and by Birrenna, an other (the yongest of all) called Helenus: all which though they were naturall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in wars, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradle. They write, that one of his sonnes being but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus aunswered the boy, to him that hath the sharpest sword. That was much like the tragicall curse wherewith Oedipus cursed his children.

So cruell, hatefull, and beastly is the nature of ambition and desire of rule: But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his country, full of honour and glory, his heart highly lifted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTES his subiects called him an Eagle, he aunswered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for your winges are the winges that haue raised mee vp. Shortly after, being aduertised that Demetrius was fallen sicke, and in great daunger of death, he sodainely went into MACEDON, to inuade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had in deede almost taken the whole land, and made him selfe Lord of all without stroke striken. For he came as farre as the city BEROEA, and found no resistance: but rather to the contrary, many of the country willingly came to his campe, and submitted them selues. The daunger Demetrius was in to loose his life, did moue him more: then the disease and sickenes of his body. And on the other side, his friends, seruaunts, and Captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in a maruellous short time, marched with great speede towards Pyrrus, being earnestly set to do some exploite against him: who being come into MACEDON but to make a road and to spoile vpon them, would not tary them, but fled, and flying, lost part of his men, because the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, & set vpon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus easily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for al that did not make light accompt of him: but pretending greater thinges, (as to recouer the landes and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting men, and of fiue hundred saile which he put to sea) would not stand to make warres against Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whilest he was absent) so dangerous a neighbour, and so ill to deale withall. But lacking leysure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more liberty set vpon the other kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrrus, the other kinges and princes began to finde out Demetrius intent, and why he had made so great preparation: and being afrayed thereof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambassadors, how they wondred how he could let go such oportunity and occasion, and to tary til Demetrius might with better leysure make warres vpon him. And why he chose rather to tary & fight with him for the aulters, temples, and sepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he should be of greater power, and haue no wars elsewhere to trouble him: then now that he might driue him out of MACEDON, hauing so many things in hand, and being troubled as he was other places. And considering also that very lately he had taken one of his wiues from him with the city of CORPHVE. For Lanassa misliking, that Pyrrus loued his other wiues better then her, (they being of a barbarous natiõ) got her vnto CORPHVE: & desiring to marry another king, sent for Demetrius, knowing that he of all other kings would soonest be wonne thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and maried her, and left a garrison in the city of CORPHVE. Now these other kings that did aduertise Pyrrus in this sort, them selues trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his purpose on notwithstanding. For on the one side Ptolomy entred GREECE with a great army, where he caused the cities to reuolt against him. And Lysimachus on the other side also into high MACEDON by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and spoiled all as he went: also arming him selfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROEA, imagining (as also fell out) that Demetrius going against Lysimachus, would leaue all the low country of MACEDON naked, without garrison or defence. And the selfe same night that Pyrrus departed, imagined that king Alexander the great did cal him, and also that he went vnto him, and him sicke in his bed, of whom he had very good wordes and entertainement: in so much promised to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined also that he was so bold to demand of him againe: how (my Lord) can you helpe me, that lie sicke in your bed? and that Alexander made answer: with my name onely. And that moreouer he so dainely therewithall got his horse Nisea, & rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This vision he had in his dream, which made him bolde, and furthermore encouraged him to goe on with his enterprise: which occasion, marching forward with all speede, in few daies he ended his entended iourney to the city of BERROEA, which so dainely he tooke at his first comming to it: the most of his army he layed in garrison there, the residue hee sent away vnder the conduct of his captaines, here and there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius hauing intelligence of, and hearing also an ill rumor that ranne in his campe amongst the MACEDONIANS, not lead them any further, for feare least (when hee should come neare to Lysimachus MACEDONIAN king by nation, and a prince esteemed for a famous captaine) they would shrinke from him, and take Lysimachus part: for this cause therefore he turned againe very sodaine against Pyrrus, as against a strange prince, and ill beloued of the MACEDONIANS: when he came to encampe neare him, many comming from BERROEA into his campe, abroad the praises of Pyrrus, saying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in wars, and courteously intreated all those he tooke to his party: and amongest those, there were others were no natural MACEDONIANS born, but set on by Pyrrus, and fained themselues to be MACEDONIANS, who gaue out, that now occasion was offered to set them at liberty, from Demetrius proud and stately rule, and to take king Pyrrus part, that was a curteous prince, and that loued souldiers and men of war. These words made the most part of Demetrius army doubtfull, insomuch as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to see if they could finde out Pyrrus to yeeld themselues vnto him. He had at that present left off his head peece: by means of, perceiuing he was not knowen, he put it on againe, and then they knew him afar off the sight of his goodly faire plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the top of creast. Whereupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as vnto soueraigne Lord and king, and required the watch word of him. Other put garlandes of boughs about their heads, because they saw his men crowned after that sort. And so so bold also, as to goe to Demetrius him selfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he should very well and wisely to giue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereof seeing his campe in such vprore, was so amased, that he knew not what way to take, but away secretly, disguised in a thred bare cloke, and a hoode on his head to keepe him from knowledge. Pyrrus forthwith seazed vppon his campe, tooke all that hee found, and was presently proclaimed in the field, king of MACEDON. Lysimachus on thother side, came straight after him, and sayed that hee had holpen to chase Demetrius out of his realme, and therefore claimed halfe the kingdome with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not trusting the MACEDONIANS too farre as yet, but rather standing in doubt of their faith: graunted Lysimachus his desire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the realme of MACEDON betweene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that present, and stoode then to good purpose to pacifie the warre, that otherwise might sodainly haue risen betweene them. But shortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and dissention betweene them. For they whose auarice and insatiable greedy appetite, neither the sea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable desertes could containe, nor yet the confines that separate ASIA from EVROPE determine: how should they bee content with their owne, without vsurping others, when their frontiers ioyne so neare together, that nothing deuideth them? Sure it is not possible. For to say truely, they are willingly together by the eares, hauing these two cursed things rooted in them: that they continually seeke occasion how to surprise each other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in appearance they vse these two tearmes of peace and warres, as they doe money: vsing it as they thinke good, not according to right and iustice, but for their priuate profite. And truely they are men of farre greater honesty, that make open warre, and auow it: then those that disguise and colour the delay of their wicked purpose, by the holy name of iustice or friendship. Which Pyrrus did truly then verefie. For desiring to keepe Demetrius down from rising another time, and that he should not requite againe as escaped from a long daungerous disease: hee went to helpe the GRECIANS against him, and was at ATHENS, where they suffered him to come into the castle, and doe sacrifice there vnto the goddesse Minerua. But comming out of the castle againe the same day, hee told the ATHENIANS he was greatly beholding vnto them for their curtesie, and the great trust they had reposed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counsell, neuer to suffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their citie, if they were wise, nor once open their gates vnto thē. So, after that he had made peace with Demetrius, who within short time being gone to make warres in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perswaded thereunto by Lysimachus) caused all THESSALY to rise against him, & went himselfe to set vpon those garrisons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in warre, then to leaue them in peace: besides that, himselfe also was of such a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowen in SYRIA, Lysimachus seeing him selfe free from feare on that side, and being at good leysure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwaies: went straight to make warre vpon Pyrrus, who then remained neare vnto the city of EDESSA, and meeting by the way with the conuoy of victuals cōming towards him, set vpon the conducters, and rifled them wholy. By this means, first he distressed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters and messengers, declaring vnto them, what shame they sustained to haue made a stranger their king (whose ancestors had euer bene their vassals & subiects) and to haue turned all those out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar friendes of king Alexander the great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were won by these perswasions, which also feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTES, and other his confederates: and so lost MACEDON by the selfe same meanes hee wanne it. Kings and princes therefore must not blame priuate men, though they chaunge and alter sometime for their profit: for therein they doe but follow the example of princes, who teach them all disloyaltie, treason, and infidelity, iudging him most worthy of gaine, that least obserueth iustice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of EPIRVS, hauing MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy enough, and in deede he had good occasiones to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if hee could haue contented himselfe only with the soueraignty ouer his owne naturall subiects. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, hee could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace he should pine away for sorrow, as Homer sayed of Achilles:

He languished and pinde by taking ease and rest:
And in the warres where trauaile was, he liked euer best.

And thus seeking matter of new trouble, fortune presented him this occasion. About this time, the ROMAINS by chaunce made war with the TARENTINES, who could neither beare

For who would not afterwards go into AFRICKE, and ſo to CARTHAGE, which alſo will be an eaſie conqueſt, ſince Agathocles ſecretly flying from SYRACVSA, and hauing paſſed the ſeas with a few ſhips, had almoſt taken it? But when we haue all in our handes: what ſhall we doe in the end? Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe: we will then (good Cineas) be merry, and take our eaſe, and make feaſts euery day, and be as merry one with an other as we can poſſible. Cineas hauing brought him to that point, ſayed againe to him: my Lord, what hindreth vs now to be quiet, & merry together, ſith we enioy that preſently without further trauell and trouble, which we will now go ſeeke for abroad, with ſuch ſheading of bloud, and ſo manifeſt danger: and yet we know not whether euer we ſhall attain vnto it, after we haue both troubled, and cauſed other to ſuffer infinit ſorrows and troubles. Theſe laſt words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his minde: for he was not ignoraunt of the happie ſtate he ſhould thereby forgoe, yet could he not leaue off the hope of that hee did ſo much deſire. So he ſent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thouſand footemen: and afterwardes the TARENTINES hauing ſent him great ſtore of flatbottomes, gallies, and of all ſortes of paſſengers, he ſhipped into them twenty Elephantes, three thouſand horſemen, and twenty thouſand footemen, with fiue hundred bowmen and ſlings. All things being ready, he wayed anckers, and hoyſed ſailes, and was no ſooner in the maine ſea, but the north winde blew very roughly, out of ſeaſon, and draue him to leeward: Notwithſtanding, the ſhip which he was in himſelfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to winde-ward, and with much a do, and marueilous daunger recouered the coaſt of ITALIE. Howbeit the reſt of his fleete were violently diſperſed here and there, whereof ſome of them failing their courſe into ITALIE, were caſt into the ſeas of LIBYA, and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the point of APVLIA, were benighted, and the ſea being high wrought, by violence driuen them vpon the ſhore, and againſt the rockes, and made ſhipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reſerued, which through her ſtrength, and the greatneſſe of her burden, reſiſted the force of the ſea that moſt violently beat againſt her. But afterwards, the wind turning & comming from the land, the ſea cruelly raking ouer the height of her forecaſtell: in fine brought her in manifeſt perill of opening, and ſplitting, and in daunger to be driuen from the coaſt, hoiſing her out againe to the mercy of the windes, which chaunged euery hower. Wherefore Pyrrus caſting the perill euery way, thought beſt to leape into the ſea. After him forthwith leapt his gard, his ſeruaunts, and other his familiar friends, venturing their liues to ſaue him. But the darkenes of the night, and rage of the waues (which the ſhore breaking, forced to rebound backe vpon them) with the great noiſe alſo, did ſo hinder their ſwimming: that it was euen day before they could recouer any land; and yet was it by meanes that the winde ſtaied. As for Pyrrus, he was ſo ſea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more though of him ſelfe he had ſo great a heart, and ſtout a courage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIONS (vpon whoſe coaſt the ſhot me had caſt him) ran out to helpe him, and diligently labored in all they could poſſible to ſaue him, and receiued alſo ſome of his ſhippes that had ſcaped, in which were a few horſemen, about two thouſand footemen, and two Elephants. With this ſmall force, Pyrrus marched on his iourney to go by land vnto TARENTVM: and Cineas being aduertised of his comming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the first he would do nothing by force, nor against the good will of the inhabitantes: vntill such time as his shippes that had escaped the daungers of the sea, were all arriued, and the greatest part of his army come together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, seeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither saue them selues, nor be saued by any other, without straight order and compulsion, because they made their reckoning that Pyrrus should fight for them, & in the meane time they would not stirre out of their houses from bathing them selues, from banqueting & making good chere: first of all he caused all the parkes and places of shew to be shut vp, where they were wont to walke and disport them selues, in any kind of exercise, and as they were wont to talke of wars as it were in pastime, and to fight with words, but not to come to the blowes. And further he forbad all feastings, mummeries, and such other like pleasures, as at that time were out of season. He trained them out also to exercise their weapons, and shewed himself very seuere in musters, not pardoning any whose names were billed to serue in the warres: somuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with such rough handling & gouernment) forsooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleasure. Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuinus the ROMAINE Cōsull came against him with a great puisant army, and that he was already entred into the land of LVCANIA, where he destroied and spoiled all the countrey before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederats, was not as yet come, hee thought it a great shame to suffer his enemies approch neare him, and therefore taking that small number he had, brought them into the field against Leuinus. Howbeit he sent a herauld before to the ROMAINS, to vnderstand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be content the controuersies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by iustice, and therein to refer them selues to arbiterment, who of himselfe would vndertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Cōsull Leuinus made answere, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a iudge, nor did they feare him for an enemy. Wherefore Pyrrus going on still, came to lodge in the plaine which is betweene the cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: and hauing newes brought him that the ROMAINS were encamped very neare vnto him on the other side of the riuer Siris, he tooke his horse, and rode to the riuers side to view their campe. So hauing throughly considered the forme, the situation, and the order of the same, the manner of charging, watch, and all their fashions of doing; he wondered much thereat. And speaking to Megacles one of his familiars about him, he said: this order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarously done, but we shall shortly proue their force. After he had thus taken his view, he beganne to be more carefull then he was before, and purposed not to fight till the whole aide of their confederates were come together, leauing men at the riuer side Siris, to keepe the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe ouer as they did in deede. For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footemen ouer vpon a bridge, and their horsemen at diuerse fordes of the riuer: insomuch as the GRECIANS for feare least they should be compassed in behinde, drew backe. Pyrrus aduertised thereof, and nothing troubled therewithall, commaunded the Captaines of his footemen presently to put their bandes in battell ray, and not to sturre till they knew his pleasure: and hee himself in the meanetime marched on with three thousand horse, in hope to finde the ROMAINES by the riuer side, as yet out of order, and vtterly vnprouided. But when he saw a far off a great number of footemen with their targettes ranged in battell, on this side the riuer, and the horsemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to ioyne close together, and himselfe first beganne the charge, being easie to bee knowen from other, if it had been more but his passing rich glistering armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deedes gaue manifest proofe of his well deserued fame and renowne. For, though he valiantly bestirred his hands and body both repulsing them, he encountered with all in fight yet he forgate not himselfe, nor neglected the iudgement and foresight, which should neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though hee had not fought at all, quietly and discreetly gaue order for euery thing, riding to and fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places where he saw them in most distresse. But euen in the hottest of the battell, Leonatus MACEDONIAN spyed an ITALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vppe and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hand with him, to set vpon him. Wherefore he said to Pyrrus: my Lord doe you not see that barbarous man there vpon a baye horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he ment to doe some notable feate and mischiefe with his owne handes: for his eye is neuer off you, but waiteth only vpon you, being sharpe set to deale with your selfe & none other, and therfore take heede of him. Pyrrus answered him, it is impossible Leonatus, for a man to auoide his destinie: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatsoeuer, shall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his speare in the middest, and setting spurs to his horse, charged vpon Pyrrus, and ranne his horse through and through with the same. Leonatus at the selfe same instant slue the ITALIANS horse in the like manner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, saued him presently, and slew the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the citie of FERENTVM, and was Captaine of a band of men of armes. This mischance made king Pyrrus looke the better to himselfe afterwardes, and seeing his horsemen giue backe, sent presently to hasten his footemen forwarde, whom he straight set in order of battell: and shifting his armour and cloke to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Meglaces armor, returned againe to the battell against the ROMAINES, who valiantly assailed him, so that the victorie depended long in doubt. For it is said, that both the one side and the other did chase, and was chased, aboue seauen times in that conflict. The changing of the kings armour serued very well for the safetie of his owne person, howbeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him loose the field. For many of his enemies set vpon Megacles that ware the kings armour: and the partie that slue him dead, and threw him starke on the ground, was one Dexias by name, who quickly snatched off his head peece, tooke away his cloake, and ranne to Leuinus the Consull, crying out alowde, that he had slaine Pyrrus, and withall shewed foorth the spoiles he supposed to haue taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, & openly shewed from hand to hand, made the ROMAINES maruellous ioyfull, and the GRECIANS to the contrary, both afeard and right sorowfull: vntill such time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed alongst all his bands bare headed, and his face, holding vp his hand to his souldiers, and giuing them to vnderstande with his owne voice, that it was himselfe. The elephants in the ende were they indeed that wanne the field, and did most distresse the ROMAINES: for, their horses seeing them a farre off, were afraide, and durst not abide them, but caried their masters backe in despight of them. Pyrrus at the sight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horsemen to giue a charge vpon them while they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the ROMAINES flie, and suffered great slaughter. For Dionysius writeth, that there died few lesse, then fifteene thousand ROMAINES at that battell. But Hieronymus speaketh onely of seuen thousand. And of Pyrrus Dionysius writeth, there were slaine thirteene thousand. But Hieronymus sayth lesse then fifteene thousand: howbeit they were all of the best men of his army, and those whom most he loued. King Pyrrus presently hereupon also tooke the ROMAINES campe, which they forsooke, and wan many of their cities from their alliance, spoiled, and ouercame much of their country. Insomuch as he came within sixe and thirty mile of ROME, whither came to his aid, the confederats of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, & the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked because they came too late to the battell. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proud to haue ouerthrowen so great an army of the ROMAINES with his own men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On the other side, the ROMAINS harts were so great, that they would not depose Leuinus from his Consulshippe, notwithstanding the losse he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius sayed openly, that they were not the EPIROTES that had ouercome the ROMAINES, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the subtilty and wise conduction of the Generall, then through the valiant feates and worthinesse of his army. And hereuppon he speedily supplied their legions againe that were diminished, with other new souldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a freſh force beſides, ſpeaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whoſe hearts were nothing appauled. Whereat Pyrrus marueilling much, thought good firſt to ſend to the ROMAINES, to proue if they would giue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the citie of ROME was no eaſie matter to compaſſe, or attaine, with that ſtrength he preſently had: and alſo that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this his valiant victory. And hereupon he ſent Cineas to ROME, who ſpake with the chiefeſt of the citie, and offered preſents to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his maſter. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his handes, but anſwered all with one voice: that if the peace might be generall to all, they all priuately would be at the kings commaundement, and would be glad of his friendſhip. Moreouer, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor ſhewed any affection to giue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their priſoners home againe without ranſome, that had beene taken at the battell, and promiſed alſo to aide them in the conqueſt of ITALIE, requiring no other recompence at their handes, ſauing their goodwils only to his maſter, & aſſurance for the TARENTINES, that they ſhould not be annoyed for anie thing paſt, without demaund of other matter. Neuertheleſſe in the end, when they had heard theſe offers, many of the Senatours yeelded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already loſt a great battell, and how they looked for greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE ſhould ioyne together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor deale in matters of ſtate at all by reaſon of his age, and partly becauſe he was blinde: when he vnderſtood of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the city, how the Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but cauſed his ſeruants to cary him in his chaire vpon their armes vnto the Senate doore, his ſonnes, and ſonnes in lawe taking him in their armes, caried him ſo into the Senate houſe. The Senate made ſilence to honour the comming in of ſo notable and worthy a perſonage: and he ſo ſoone as they had ſet him in his ſeate, began to ſpeake in this ſorte. Hitherto vnto with great impatience (my Lords of ROME) haue I borne the loſſe of my ſight, but now I would I were alſo as deafe as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the reports of your diſhonourable conſultations determined vpon in Senate, which tende to ſubuerte the glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and mighty bragges you blazed abroad through the whole worlde? That if Alexander the great himſelfe had come into ITALIE, in the time that our fathers had bin in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not haue ſaide euery where that he was altogether vincible, as now at this preſent they do: but either he ſhould haue left his body ſlaine here in battell, or at the leaſtwiſe haue bene driuen to flie, and by his death or flying ſhould greatly haue enlarged the renowme and glory of ROME. You plainely ſhew it nowe, that all the words ſpoken then, were but vaine & arrogant vaunts of fooliſh pride. Conſidering that ye tremble for fear of the MOLOSSIANS & CHAONIANS, who were euer a prey to the MACEDONIANS: and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus alſo, who all his life time ſerued and followed on the gard vnto Alexander the great, and now is come to make wars in theſe parts, not to aide the GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALY, but to flie from his enemies there about his own countrie, offering you to conquer all the reſt of ITALIE with an army, wherewith he was nothing able to keepe a ſmall part of MACEDON only for him ſelfe. And therefore you muſt not perſuade your ſelues, that in making peace with him, you ſhall thereby be rid of him: but rather you draw others to come & ſet vpon you beſides. For they will vtterly deſpiſe you, when they ſhall heare ye are ſo eaſily ouercome, and that you haue ſuffered Pyrrus to eſcape your hands before you made him feele the iuſt reward of his bolde preſumptuous attempt vpon you. Againe rying with him for a further hier, this aduantage ouer you, that he hath giuen a great ouerthrow on both to the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After that Appius had tolde this tale vnto the Senate, euery one through the whole aſſembly altered rather warre then peace. They diſpatched Cineas away thereupon with this anſwer, Cineas ſent Ambaſſador to Rome. The noble mind of the Romaines.

Appius Claudius diſſwaded the Romaines from making peace with Pyrrus.

Appius Claudius oration to the Senate.

if Pyrrus ſought the ROMAINES friendſhippe, he muſt firſt depart out of ITALIE, and then ſende vnto them to treate of peace: but ſo long as he remained there with his armie, the ROMAINES would make warres vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowen and ſlaine tenne thouſand ſuch Captaines as Leuinus was. They ſay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intreating for this peace, did curiouſly labour to conſider and vnderſtand the manners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their common weale, diſcourſing thereof with the chiefeſt men of the citie: and how afterwards he made ample report of the ſame vnto Pyrrus, and tolde him amongeſt other things, that the Senate appeared to him, a councell-houſe of many kings. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they ſhould fight againſt ſuch a ſerpent, as that which was in olde time in the mariſhes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut off one heade ſeuen other came vp in the place: becauſe the Conſull Leuinus had now leuied an other armie, twiſe as great as the firſt was, and had left at ROME alſo, many times as many good able men to carie armor. After this, there were ſent Ambaſſadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongſt other, Caius Fabricius touching the ſtate of the priſoners. Cineas tolde the king his maſter, that this Fabricius was one of the greateſt men of account in all ROME, a right honeſt man, a good Captaine, and a very valiant man of his handes, yet poore in deede he was notwithſtanding. Pyrrus taking him ſecretly a ſide, made very much of him, and amongſt other things, offered him both golde and ſiluer, praying him to take it, not for any diſhoneſt reſpect he ment towards him, but onely for a pledge of the goodwill and friendſhip that ſhould be betweene them. Fabricius would none of his gift: ſo Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithſtanding the next morning thinking to feare him, becauſe he had neuer ſeene elephant before, Pyrrus commaunded his men, that when they ſawe Fabricius and him talking together, they ſhould bring one of his greateſt elephants, and ſet him harde by them, behinde a hanging: which being done at a certaine ſigne by Pyrrus giuen, ſodainly the hanging was pulled backe, and the elephant with his truncke was ouer Fabricius head, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius ſoftly giuing backe, nothing afraide, laughed and ſaid to Pyrrus ſmiling: neither did your golde (oh king) yeſterday moue me, nor your elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileſt they were at ſupper, falling in talke of diuerſe matters, ſpecially touching the ſtate of GREECE, and the Philoſophers there: Cineas by chance ſpake of EPICVRVS, and rehearſed the opinions of the EPICVRIANS touching the gods and gouernment of the commonwealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleaſure, how they fled from all office and publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither mooued with pitty nor anger, & led an idle life full of all pleaſures and delightes, without taking any regarde of mens doings. But as he ſtill continued this diſcourſe, Fabricius cried out aloude, and ſaid: the goddes grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of ſuch opinions, as long as they had warres againſt vs. Pyrrus marſelling much at the conſtancy and magnanimity of this man, was more deſirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And priuately prayed Fabricius very earneſtly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remain with him, ſaying: that he would giue him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongſt all his friends. Whereunto Fabricius aunſwered him ſoftly: that were not good (oh king) for your ſelfe, quoth he: for your men that preſently doe honor and eſteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chooſe me for their king, then your ſelfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whoſe wordes Pyrrus tooke not in ill part, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyrant would haue bene: but did him ſelfe report to his friends and familiars the noble minde hee found in him, and deliuered him vppon his faith only, all the ROMAINE priſoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet ſee their friendes, and keepe the feaſt of Saturne with them, and then to ſend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate eſtabliſhed by decree, vppon paine of death to all ſuch as ſhould not performe the ſame accordingly. Afterwardes Fabricius was choſen Conſull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from king Pyrrus Phiſitian, written with his owne handes: in which the Phiſitian offered to poiſon his maſter, ſo he would promiſe him a good reward, for ending the warres without further danger. Fabricius detesting the wickednesse of the Phisitian, and hauing made Q. AEmylius his colleague and fellowe Consull also, to abhorre the same: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heede, for there were that ment to poyson him. The contents of his letter were these: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus AEmylius Consuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (oh king) made vnfortunate choise, both of your friends and of your enemies, as shall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for you make warres with iust and honest men, and do your selfe truste altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therefore we haue thought good to aduertise you, not in respect to pleasure you, but for feare least the misfortune of your death might make vs vniustly to be accused: imagining that by trecherie of treason, we haue sought to end this warre, as though by valiantnesse we could not otherwise atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing read this letter, and proued the contentes thereof true, executed the Phisitian as he had deserued: and to requite the aduertisement of the Consuls, he sent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their prisoners, without paying of ransome, and sent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit, the ROMAINES, because they would neither receiue pleasure of their enemies, and least of all reward, for that they consented not vnto so wicked a deede did not onely refuse to take their prisoners of free gift, but they sent him againe so many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendship, they would haue no care to it, before the warres were ended, and that he had sent away his armie againe by sea into his kingdome of EPIRVS. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing no remedie, but that he must needes fight an other battell, after he had somewhat refreshed his armie, drewe towards the citie of ASCVLVM, where he fought the second time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into maruellous ill ground for horsemen, by a very swift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deepe marishes, insomuch as his elephants could haue no space nor ground to ioine with the battell of the footmen, by reason wherof there was a great number of men hurt and slaine on both sides. And in the end, the battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did seuere them: but the next morning, Pyrrus to winne the aduantage to fight in the plaine field, where he might preuaile with the force of his elephants, sent first certaine of his bandes to seize vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thrust in amongst his elephants store of shot, and slingmen, and then made his army marche (being very well set in order) with great furie against his enemies. They missing the other dayes turnings and places of aduantage were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine field: and striuing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footemen before the elephants came, they desperately preased in vpon their enemies pikes with their swordes, not caring for their owne persons what became of them, but only looked to kill and destroy their enemies. In the end notwithstanding, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES lost it, and they first beganne to breake and flie on that side where Pyrrus was, by reason of the great force and fury of his charge, and more more through the violence of the Elephants: against which, the ROMAINES valiantnesse and courage could ought preuaile, but that they were driuen to giue them place (much like the rage of surging waues, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to bee troden vnder feete, and ouerthrowen by them, whom they were not able to hurt againe, but be by them most grieuously martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothing eased. The chase was not long, because they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the historiographer writeth that there died sixe thousand men of the ROMAINES, and of Pyrrus part about three thousand fiue hundred and fiue, as the kings owne Chronicles doe witnesse. Neuertheless, Dionysius makes no mention of two battels giuen neare vnto the citty of ASCVLVM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainely ouerthrowen: howbeit he confirmeth that there was one battell only that continued vntil sunne set, and that they scarcely seuered also when night was come. Pyrrus being hurt on the arme with a speare, and his cariage robbed and spoiled by the SAMNITES besides. And further, that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thousand men as well of Pyrrus side, as of the ROMAINES part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus aunswered one, who reioyced him for the victorie they had wonne: if we win an other of the price, quoth he, we are vtterly vndone. For indeed then had he loſt the moſt part of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his friendes and Captaines in manner euery one, or at the leaſt there lacked litle of it: and beſides that, he had no meanes to ſupply them with other from thence, and perceiued alſo that the confederates he had in ITALIE, beganne to waxe colde. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did eaſily renew their army with freſh ſouldiers, which they cauſed to come from ROME as neede required (much like vnto a liuely ſpring, the head whereof they find at home in their country) and they fainted not at all for any loſſes they receiued, but rather were they ſo much the more hotly bent, ſtoutly determining to abide out the warres, what euer betide. And thus whileſt Pyrrus was troubled in this ſort, new hopes and new enterpriſes were offred vnto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For euen at a clap came Ambaſſadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his hands, the cities of SYRACVSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, & beſeeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrants. And on the other ſide alſo, newes was brought him from GREECE, how Ptolomie ſurnamed the lightning, was ſlaine, and all his army ouerthrowen in battell againſt the GAVLES, and that now he ſhould come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he curſed his hard fortune that preſented him all at once, ſuch ſundry occaſions to doe great things: and as if both enterpriſes had bene already in his hande, he made his accompt that of neceſſitie he muſt looſe one of them. So, long debating the matter with him ſelfe, which of the two wayes he ſhould conclude vpon: in the ende he reſolued, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, conſidering that AFRICKE was not farre from them. Wherefore, diſpoſing himſelfe that way, he ſent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to ſpeake to the townes and cities of the countrie as he was wont to do: & in the meanetime left a ſtrong garriſon in the city of TARENTVM, to keepe it at his deuotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made requeſt vnto him, either to remaine in their countrie to maintaine wars with them againſt the ROMAINS, (which was their meaning why they ſent for him) or elſe if he would needs go, at the leaſtwiſe to leaue their city in as good ſtate as he found it. But he aunſwered them againe very roughly, that they ſhould ſpeake no more to him in it, and that they ſhould not chooſe but tary his occaſion. And with his aunſwer tooke ſhip, and ſailed towardes SICILIA: where ſo ſoone as he was arriued, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingly put themſelues into his hands. And there neceſſitie of battell was offered him to employ his armie, nothing at the beginning durſt ſtand before him. For, with thirtie thouſand footemen, two thouſand fiue hundred horſemen, and two hundred ſaile which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the country vnder their obedience. Nowe at that time, the city of ERIX was the ſtrongeſt place they had: and there were a great number of good ſouldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to proue the aſſault of it, and when his army was ready to giue the charge, he armed him ſelfe at all peeces from toppe to toe, and approching the walles, vowed vnto Hercules to giue him a ſolemne ſacrifice, with a feaſt of common ioyes, ſo that he would graunt him grace to ſhew him ſelfe vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble anceſters from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his handes. This vow ended, he ſtraight made the trumpettes ſound to the aſſault, and cauſed the barbarous people that were on the wals, to retire with force of his ſhot. Then when the ſcaling ladders were ſet vp, him ſelfe was the firſt that mounted on the walle, where he found diuerſe of the barbarous people that reſiſted him. But ſome he threw ouer the wals on either ſide of him, and with his ſword ſlew many dead about him, him ſelfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenaunce was ſo terrible. And this doth proue that Homer ſpake wiſely, and like a man of experience, when he ſayed: that valiantneſſe onely amongeſt all other morall vertues is that, which hath ſometimes certaine furious motions and diuine prouocations, which makes a man beſides him ſelfe. So the city being taken, he honorably performed his vowed ſacrifice to Hercules, & kept feaſt of all kindes and ſorts of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GRECIANS thereabouts, making many of them pay taxe & tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good souldiers, and had their name also of Mars, because they were martiall men, and giuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army against them, and ouerthrewe them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the taxe, and rased many of their fortresses. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendship, offering him shippes and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a short aunswere, that there was but one way to make peace and loue betwene them, to forsake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GRECE and them. For his good fortune, and the force he had in his handes, did set him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aspiring first of all vnto the conquest of LIBYA. Now, to passe him ouer thither he had ships enough, but he lacked owers and mariners wherefore when he would presse them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and seuerely punished them, that would not obey his commaundement. This he did not at his first comming, but contrarily had wonne all their good wils, speaking more courteously to them then any other did, & shewing that he trusted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But sodainely being altered from a popular prince vnto a violent tyrant, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worst of all, vnfaithfull and ingratefull: neuertheless, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they suffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demaund. But when they saw he began to mistrust Thænon and Sostratus, the two chiefe Captaines of SYRACVSA, and they who first caused him to come into SICILIA, who also at his first arriuall deliuered the city of SYRACVSA into his hands, & had bin his chiefe aiders in helping him to compasse that he had done in SICILIA: when I say they saw he would no more cary them with him, nor leaue them behinde him for the mistrust he had of them, and that Sostratus fled from him, and absented himselfe, fearing least Pyrrus would do him some mischiefe: and that Pyrrus moreouer, had slaine Thænon to death, mistrusting that he would also haue done him some harme. Then all things fell out against Pyrrus, not one after an other, nor by litle and litle, but all together at once: for stant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe some of them conspirate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to set vpon him. And when all SICILIA was thus bent against him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES & TARENTINES, by which they aduertised him, how they had much a doe to defende themselues within their cities and strong holdes, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherefore they earnestly besought him speedily to come to their aide. This newes came happily to him, to cloake his flying, that he might say it was not for despaire of good successe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was indeed, that when he saw he could no longer keep it, then a shippe could stand still among the waues, hee sought some honest shadow to cloke his departing. And that surely was the cause why he returned againe into ITALIE. Nevertheless, at his departure out of SICILE, they say that looking backe vpon the Ile, he said to them that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell, my friends, doe we leaue to the ROMAINS and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other? And verily so it fell out shortly after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous people conspiring together against Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one side watching his passage, gaue him battell on the sea, in the very straight it selfe of MESSINA, where he lost many of his ships, and fled with the rest, & so to the coast of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other side, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteene thousand fighting men: durst not present him battell in the field, but taried for him in certaine straights of the mountaines, and in very hard places, and set vpon his rereward, and disordered all his army. They slew two of his elephants, and put off a great number of his rereward, so as he was compelled him selfe in person to come to his vangard, to helpe them against the barbarous people, which were lusty valiant men, and old trained souldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a sword, and was in great danger: insomuch as he was forced to retire out of the preasse and fight, which did much the more encorage his enemies. Among which there was one more aduenturous the reſt, a goodly man of perſonage, fayre armed in white armour, who aduauncing himſelfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bold and fierce voice, and chalenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this brauery, turned againe with his gard, in ſpight of his men, hurte as he was. And beſides that, he was all on a fire with choller, and his face al bloody and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous villaine that had chalenged him: and gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with al his force & power, that what by the ſtrength of his arme, & through the goodnes of the temper and mettle of the ſword, the blow claue his head right in the middeſt, downe to the ſhoulders: ſo that his heade being thus deuided, the one parte fell on the one ſhoulder, & the other part on the other. This matter ſodainely ſtayed the barbarous people, and kept them from going any further, they were ſo afrayde and amaſed both to ſee ſo great a blow with ones hande, and it made them thinke indeede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iorney, arriued at the length in the city of TARENTVM, with twenty thouſand footmen, and three thouſand horſe. And with theſe (ioyning therto the choiceſt picked men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to ſeeke out he ROMAINES, who had their camp within the territories of the SAMNITES, which were thē in very hard ſtate. For their hartes were killed, becauſe that in many battels & encounters with the ROMAINES, they were euer ouerthrowen. They were very angry beſides with Pyrrus, for that he had forſaken them, to go his voyage vnto SICILIA, by reaſon whereof there came no great number of ſouldiers into his campe. But notwithſtanding, he deuided all his ſtrength into two partes, whereof he ſent the one part into LVCANIA, to occupy one of the ROMAINE Conſulles that was there, to the end he ſhould not come to ayde his companion: and with the other part he went himſelfe againſt Manius Curius, who lay in a very ſtrange place of aduantage neere to the cittie of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that ſhould come to him out of LVCANIA, beſides alſo that the Soothſayers (by the ſignes and tokens of the birdes and ſacrifices) did counſell him not to ſtur from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, deſiring to fight with Manius before his ayde came vnto him, which he looked for out of LVCANIA, took with him the beſt ſouldiers he had in al his army, and the warlikeſt elephants, and marched away in the night, ſuppoſing to ſteale vpon Manius on the ſodaine, and giue an aſſault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to go, and through a woddy country, his lights and torches failed him, by reaſon whereof many of his ſouldiers loſt their way, and they loſt a great deale of time alſo, before they could again be gathered together: ſo as in this ſpace the night was ſpent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceiued plainely how he came downe the hils. This at the firſt ſight made thē muſe a while, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheleſſe Manius hauing had the ſignes of the ſacrifices fauorable, and ſeing that occaſion did preſſe him to it, went out into the field, and ſet vpon the vowarde of his enemies, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the reſt in ſuch wiſe, that there were ſlaine a great number of them in the field, and certaine elephantes alſo taken. This victory made Manius Curius leaue his ſtrength, and come into the plaine field, where he ſet his men in battel ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one ſide: but on the other he was repulſed by violence of the elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his own campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to garde it. So when he ſaw them vpon the rampers of his campe al armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they commig freſh out of places of aduantage, to charge vpon the elephantes, compelled them in a very ſhort time to turne their backes, & flie through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble, and diſorder: ſo as in the end, the whole victory fell vpon the ROMAINES ſide, and conſequently by meanes of that victory, followed the greatnes and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES being growen more couragious by this battel and hauing increaſed their force, and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable: immediatly after conquered all ITALIE beſides, and ſoone after that, all SICILIA. To this end as you ſee, came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE & SICILIA, after he had ſpent ſixe yeres continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, & his army conſumed. Notwithſtāding, his noble courage remained alwaies inuincible, what loſſes ſoeuer he had ſuſtained: and moreouer whileſt he liued, he was euer eſteemed the chiefeſt of all the kings & princes in his time, as well for his experience and ſufficiency in warres, as alſo for the valiantnes and hardines of his perſon. But what he wanne by famous deeds, he loſt by vaine hopes: deſiring ſo earneſtly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice player that caſteth well but cannot vſe his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into EPIRVS, eight thouſand footemen, and fiue hundreth horſemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuiſed with himſelfe to ſeeke out ſome new warre to entertaine thoſe ſouldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a new aide of certaine GAVLES being come vnto him, he entred into the realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius ſonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a forrey, and to get ſome ſpoile in the country. But when he ſawe that he had taken diuerſe holdes, and moreouer, that two thouſand men of warre of the country came and yeelded themſelues vnto him: he beganne to hope of better ſucceſſe, then at the firſt he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched againſt king Antigonus ſelfe, whom he met in a very ſtraight valley, and at his firſt cõming, gaue ſuch a luſty charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus army in great diſorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his army to cloſe it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valiantly defend the firſt charge: and the skirmiſh was ſo hotte, that the moſt of them were ſlaine. After them, the leaders of the elephants perceiuing they were enuironed on euery ſide, yeelded themſelues and their beaſtes. Pyrrus ſeing his power to be now increaſed, with ſuch a ſupply, truſting more to his good fortune, then any good reaſon might moue him: thruſt further into the battell of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afraide, and troubled for the ouerthrow of their rereward, ſo as they would not once baſe their pikes, nor fight againſt him. He in his part holding vp his hand, and calling the Captaines of the bands by their names, ſtraightwayes made all the footmen of Antigonus turne wholly to his ſide: who flying ſaued himſelfe with a fewe horſemen, and kept certaine of the cities in his realme vpon the ſea coaſt. But Pyrrus in all his proſperitie iudging nothing more to redound to his honour and glory, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aſide their goodlieſt and richeſt ſpoyles, and offred the ſame in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inſcription.

Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yeelded vnto him: but when he had the citie of ÆGES in his power, he vſed the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & ſpecially becauſe he left a great garriſõ of the GAVLES there which he had in pay. This nation is extreame couetous, as then they ſhewed themſelues: for they ſpared not to breake vp the tombes wherein the kings of MACEDON lay buried there, tooke away all the gold & ſiluer they could finde, and afterwards with great inſolency caſt out their bones into the open winde. Pyrrus was tolde it, but he lightly paſſed it ouer, and made no reckoning of it: either becauſe he deferred it till another time, by reaſon of the warres he had then in hande: or for that he durſt not medle with puniſhing of theſe barbarous people at that time. But whatſoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things ſure in MACEDON, not being fully poſſeſt of the ſame: new toyes and hope came into his head, and mocking Antigonus ſaid he was a mad man to go apparelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloke might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of SPARTA being come to procure him bring his army into the coũtry of LACEDÆMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the blud royall of SPARTA, but because he was a cruel man & would do al things by authority, they loued him not at SPARTA, nor trusted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, & made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the cõmon wealth of SPARTA: but besides that, he had another priuate quarrell, which grew vpon this cause. In his old yeares, Cleonymus had maried a faire yoũg lady called Chelidonide, which was also of the blood royall, & the daughter of Leotychides. This lady being fallen extreamely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a goodly yong gentleman, and in his lusty youth, she greatly vexed and dishonored her husband Cleonymus, who was ouer heade and eares in loue and ielousie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but planely knew that his wife made none account of him. And thus his home sorrowes, being ioyned with his outward common grieues, euen for spight, desiring a reuenge, in choller he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto SPARTA, to restore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆMONIA forthwith, with fiue & twenty thousand footmen, two thousand horse, and foure and twenty elephantes: by which preparation, though by nothing else, the world might plainely see, that Pyrrus came with a minde not to restore Cleonymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intẽt to conquer for himselfe (if he could) all the coũtrie of PELOPONNESVS. For in words he denied it to the LACEDÆMONIANS themselues, who sent Ambãssadors vnto him, when he was in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into PELOPONNESVS, to set the townes and cities at libertie which Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to send his young sonnes into SPARTA (so they would be contẽted) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kings, to haue beene well brought vp. But fayning these things, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the coast of LACONIA, into the which he was no sooner entred, but he began to spoyle and wast the whole country. And when the Ambassadors of SPARTA reproued and found fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in such sort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them answer: no more haue you your selues vsed to proclaime that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassadors called Mandricidas: replied again vnto him in the LACONIAN tongue. If thou be a god, thou wilt doe vs no hurte, because we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou shalt meete with another that shalbe better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gaue him counsell euen at the first, to assault it. But he would not so do fearing (as they sayed) that if he did it by night, his souldiers would sacke the city: and sayed it should be time enough to assault it the next day at broad day light, because there were but few men within the town, and beside they were very ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus himselfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTYNIANS, who had warres in his owne country. And doubtles, that only was the sauing of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckning to assault it hotly: because they thought it was not able to make resistance. For Pyrrus camped before the towne, throughly perswaded with himselfe, that he should finde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus friends and seruantes also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should haue come to supper to him, and logded with him. When night was come the LACEDÆMONIANS counselled together, & secretely determined to send away their wiues, and litle children into CRETA. But the women themselues were against it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate house with a sword in her hand, to speak vnto them in the name of all the rest, and sayd, That they did their wiues great wrong, if they thought them so fainte harted, as to liue after SPARTA were destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in councell, that they should cast a trench before the enemies campe, and that at both the endes of the same they should bury cartes in the ground vnto the middest of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the elephantes, and keepe them from passing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came wiues and maydes vnto them, some of them their clothes girt vp round about them, and others all in their smockes, to worke at this trench with the olde men, aduising the young men that ſhould fight the next morning, to reſt themſelues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third parte of the trench to taske, which was ſixe cubites broade, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundreth foote long as Philarchus ſayeth or litle leſſe as Hyeronimus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, & the enemies remoued to come to the aſſault, the women themſelues fecthed the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, & deliuered them the taske of the trench ready made, which they before had vndertaken, encouraging them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleaſure it were to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and ſight of their native country, & what great glory and honor it is to die in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valiantly like an honeſt man, & worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being greatly afraide, had tyed a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to ſtrangle & hang herſelfe rather then to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the city ſhould come to be taken.

Now Pyrrus marched in perſon with his battell of footemen, againſt the front of the SPARTANS, who being a great number alſo, did tarry his comming on the other ſide of the trench: the which, beſides that it was very ill to paſſe ouer, did let the ſouldiers alſo to fight ſteadily in order of battell, becauſe the earth being newly caſt vp, did yeeld vnder their feet. Whereupon Ptolomie king Pyrrus ſonne, paſſing all alongſt the trech ſide with two thouſand GAVLES, all the choice men of the CHAONIANS, aſſayed if he could get ouer to the other ſide at one of the endes of the trench where the cartes were: which being ſet very deepe into the ground and one ioyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the aſſaylants, but the defendants alſo. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to plucke off the wheels of theſe cartes, and to caſt them into the riuer. But Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a young man, ſeing the daunger, paſſed through the city with a troupe of three hundreth luſty youths beſides, & went to incloſe Ptolomie behind, before he eſpied him, for that he paſſed a ſecret hollow way till he came euen to giue the charge vpon them: wherby they were enforced to turne their faces towardes him, one rubbing in anothers necke, and ſo in great diſorder were thruſt into the trenches, and vnder the cartes: inſomuch as at the laſt, with much a do, and great bloodſhed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulſed them. Now the women and old men, that were on the other ſide of the trench, ſaw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulſed the GAVLES. Wherefore after Acrotatus had done this exployte, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare blood: couragiouſly and liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus more noble and fayter to behold, then euer he was: ſo that the all thought Chelidonida happy to haue ſuch a friend and louer. And there were certaine olde men, that followed him crying after him, go thy way Acrotatus, and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble children for her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruel on that ſide where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongſt other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and ſlaine many of his enemies with his owne hands, that forced to paſſe ouer the trench: perceiuing that his hart fainted for the great number of wounds he had vpon him, called one of them that were in the rancke next behind him, and giuing him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friendes, becauſe his enemies ſhould not haue his bodie. In the ende, the battell hauing continued all the day long, the night did ſeparate them: and Pyrrus, being layd in his bed, had this viſion in his ſleepe. He thought he ſtroke the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, that he vtterly conſumed it: whereat he was ſo reioyſing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked. And thereuppon forthwith commaunded his Captaines to make their men ready to the aſſault: and told his dreame vnto his familiars, ſuppoſing that out of doubt it did betoken he ſhould in that approach take the cittie. All they that heard it, beleeued it was ſo, ſauing one Lyſimachus: who to the contrary ſayed, that this viſion liked him not, becauſe the places ſmitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawful to enter into them: by reaſon whereof he was alſo afraide, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould not enter into the cittie of SPARTA. Pyrrus anſwered him: that ſayed he, is a matter diſputable to & fro in an open aſſembly of people, for there is no māner of certainty in it. And furthermore, euery man muſt take his weapon in his hand, & ſet this ſentence before his eyes

Alluding vnto Homers verses, which he wrote for the defence of his country. And saying so, he rose, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the assault. On the other side also, the LACEDÆMONINS with a maruellous courage and magnanimity, far greater thē their force, stirred themselues wonderfully to make resistance, hauing their wiues by them that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to giue meate & drinke to them that needed, and did also withdrawe those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their parte, indeuored themselues with all their might to fill vp the trench with wood and other things, which they cast vpon the dead bodies and armours lying in the bottome of the ditch: & the LACEDÆMONIANS again, labored all that they could possible to let them. But in this great broile, one perceiued Pyrrus on horse backe to haue lept the trench, past ouer the strength of the cartes, and make force to enter into the city. Where-vpon those that were appointed to defend that part of the trenche, cryed out straight: and the women fell a shrecking, and running as if all had bene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further, striking down with his owne hands all that stood before him, a CRETAN shot at him, & stroke his horse through both sides: who leaping out of the preasse for paine of his wound, dying, caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vpon the hanging of a steepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the toppe. This put all his seruantes and friendes about him in a maruellous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS seing them in this feare and trouble ran immediatly vnto that place, and with force of shotte draue them all out of the trench. After this retyre, Pyrrus caused all assault to cease, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yelde, considering there were many of them slaine in the two dayes past, and all the rest in a maner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the city (whether it were to proue the valiantnes of the inhabitants themselues, or at the least to shew what power they were of euen in their greatest need and distresse, whē the LACEDÆMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aristeas Phocian from CORINTH, one of king Antigonus Captains with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he was entred, king Pyrrus arriued also on the other side frō CRETA, & two thousand souldiers with him. So the women went home to their houses, making their reckening that they should not neede any more to trouble themselues with warres. They gaue the olde men liberty also to go and rest themselues, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driuen to arme themselues, and take weapon in hand: and in order of battell placed the newe-come souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that new supplies were come, grew to greater stomacke then before, and inforced all that he could to win the town by assault. But in the end, when all his cost he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the siege, and went to spoyle all the country about, determining to lye there in garrison all the winter. He could not for all this auoide his destinie. For there rose a sedition in the city of ARGOS betweene two of the chiefest citizens, Aristeas and Aristippus: and because Aristeas thought that king Antigonus did fauor his enemie Aristippus, he made haste to send first vnto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the present prosperity for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loser, then he sought to recouer himselfe, and to restore his losse by some other newe attemptes. So that either for being conquerour, nor ouercome, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled himself and himselfe also: by reason whereof, he sodainly departed towards ARGOS. But king Pyrrus hauing layed ambushes for him in diuerse places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe: gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the tayle of his army. Now, the selfesame day Pyrrus was warned by a soothsayer, who sacrificing had found the liuer of the sacrificed beast infected: that it betokned the losse of some most neere vnto him. But when he heard the noyse of the charge giuen, he thought not on the warning of the Soothsayer, but commaunded his sonne to take his household seruantes with him, and to go thither: as he himselfe in the meane time with as great haste as he coulde, made the rest of his army march, to get them quickely out of this dangerous way. The fray was very horte about Ptolomie Pyrrus sonne, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whom he had to doe, led by a valiant Captaine, called Eualcus. But as he fought valiantly against those that stoode before him, there was a souldier of CRETA called Oræsus, borne in the city of APTERA, a mã very ready of hand, and light of foote, who running alongst by him, stroke him such a blow on his side that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being slaine, his company began straight to flye: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chase so hotly, that they tooke no heede of themselues, vntill they saw they were in the plaine field farre from their footmen. Wherfore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his sonne was newly reported, being on fire with sorrow & passion, turned sodainly vpon them with the men of armes of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruellous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that euery where before that time he was terrible and intiincible, hauing his sworde in his hand: yet then he did shew more proofe of his valiantnesse, strength, and courage, then he had euer done before. And when he had sette spurres to his horse against Eualcus to close with him: Eualcus turned on the one side, and gaue Pyrrus such a blowe with his sword, that he missed litle the cutting off his bridle hand: for he cut indeede all the raines of the bridle asunder. But Pyrrus straight ran him through the bodie with his speare, and lighting off frõ his horse, he put all the troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the sword that were about the body of Eualcus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the Captaines was cause of that losse vnto their country for nothing, considering that the wars against thẽ were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made sacrifice of these poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the soule of his dead sonne, and fought thus wonderfully also, to honour his funerals, conuerting a great part of his sorrow for his death, into anger and wrath against his enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And vnderstanding that king Antigonus had already seazed the hils that were ouer the valley, he lodged neere vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following sent an herauld vnto Antigonus, & sent him defiance, calling him wicked man, and chalenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to trye which of them two should be king. Antigonus made him answer that he made warres as much with time as with weapon: & furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had wayes open enough to put himselfe to death. The cittizens of ARGOS also sent Ambassadors vnto them both, to pray them to departe, sith they knew that there was nothing for them to see in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, & so vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, and gaue them his sonne for hostage. Pyrrus also made them faire promise so to do to, but because he gaue no caution nor sufficient pledge to perform it, they mistrusted him the more. Then there fell out many great & wonderful tokens, as well vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus hauing sacrificed oxen, their heads being stricken off from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and licked vp their owne blood. And within the city of ARGOS, a sister of the temple of Apollo Lysias, called Apollonis ranne through the streetes, crying out that she saw the city full of murther, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fray, howbeit she vanquished away sodainly and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then comming hard to the walles of ARGOS in the night & finding one of the gates called Diãperes, opened by Aristeas, he put in his GAVLES who possessed the market place, before the citizens knew any thing of it. But because the gate was too low to passe the elephantes through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke and in tumult: by reason whereof they lost much time, so that the citizens in the end perceiued it and ran incontinently vnto the castell of Aspides, & into other strong places of the city. And therewithall, they sent with present speede vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and help them, and so he did: and after he was come hard to the wals, he remained without with his skowtes, and in the meane time sent his son with his chiefest Captaines into the towne, who brought a great nũber of good souldiers, and men of warres with them. At the same time also arriued Areus king of SPARTA, with a thousand of the CRETANS, & most lusty SPARTANS: all which ioyning together, came to giue a charge vpõ the GAVLES that were in the market place, who put them in a maruellous feare and hazard. Pyrrus entring on that side also of the citie called Cylarabis, with terrible noise and cries: when he vnderstoode that the GAVLES answered him not lustily and couragiously, he doubted straight that it was the voice of men distressed, and that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with speede to relieue them, driuing the horsemen forwardes that marched before him, with great danger and paine, by reason of holes, and sinckes, and water conduites, whereof the citie was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongst them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man saw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commaunded, by reason of the great noise they made, straying here and there vp and downe the streetes, the one scattered from the other: neither could the Captaines set their men in order, as well for the darkenesse of the night, as also for the confused tumult that was all the citie ouer, and for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both sides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceiued the castle of Alpides, full of armed enemies. And furthermore, sodainly as he was come into the market place, amongst many other goodly common works set out to beautifie the same, he spied the images of a bull and a wolfe in copper, the which fought one with an other. This sight made him afraide, because at that present he remembred a prophecie that had bene told him, that his end and death should be when he saw a wolfe and a bull fight together. The ARGIVES report, that these images were set vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance that had happened in their countrie. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pyramia (as one would say, land sowen with corne) in the country of THYREATIDE, he saw as he went, a wolfe fight with a bull: whereupon he staied to see what the ende of their fight would come to, supposing the case in himselfe, that the wolfe was of his side, because that being a stranger as he was, he came to set vpon the naturall inhabitants of the countrie. The wolfe in the end obtained the victorie: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lyceus, followed on his enterprise, and had so good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the wolfe & bull were set vp in the market place of ARGOS. Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them, and also because nothing fell out well according to his expectation, thought best to retire: but fearing the straightnesse of the gates of the citie, he sent vnto his sonne Helenus, whom he had left without the citie with the greatest part of his force and armie, commanding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall that his men might the more readily get out, and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chance did hinder their comming out. But the messenger whom he sent, was so hastie and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus said vnto him, but reported his message quite contrarie. Whereupon the young prince Helenus taking the best souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants, entered into the citie to helpe his father, who was now comming backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retyring still, he valiantly repulsed those that set vpon him, turning his face oft vnto them. But when hee was driuen vnto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the citie, he was kept in with his owne men that entered at the same gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noise was so great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behind, and did still thrust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the Elephantes by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grinding his teeth did hinder those also, that would haue come out and giuen backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the citie, called Nicon (as much to say, as conquering) seeking his gouernour that was striken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes: ranne vpon them that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing friends and foes one in an others necke, till at the length hauing found the bodie of his master slaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and carying him vpon his two tushes, returned backe with great furie, treading all vnder feete that stoode in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this sort, there was not one that could helpe himselfe: for it seemed to be a masse & heape of a multitude, and one whole bodie ſhut together, which ſometime thruſt forwarde, and ſometime gaue backe, as the ſway went. They fought not ſo much againſt their enemies, who ſet vpon them behinde: but they did themſelues more hurt then their enemies did. For if any drewe out his ſworde, or baſed his pike, he could neither ſcabarde the one againe, nor lift vp the other, but thruſt it full vpon his owne fellowes that came in to helpe them, and ſo killed themſelues one thruſting vpon an other. Wherefore Pyrrus ſeeing his people thus troubled and harried to and fro, tooke his crowne from his head which he ware vpon his helmet, that made him knowen of his men a farre off, & gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and truſting then to the goodneſſe of his horſe, flew vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus ſet vpon him that had hurt him, who was an ARGIAN borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore old womans ſonne, whoſe mother at that preſent time was gotten vp to the toppe of the tyles of a houſe, as all other women of the citie were, to ſee the fight. And ſhe perceiuing that it was her ſonne whom Pyrrus came vpon, was ſo afrighted to ſee him in that danger, that ſhe tooke a tyle, and with both her handes caſt it vpon Pyrrus. The tyle falling off from his head by reaſon of his head peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, and brake his neck bone aſunder: wherewith he was ſodainely ſo benummed, that he loſt his ſight with the blow, and the raines of his bridle fell out of his hande, and himſelfe fell from his horſe to the ground, by the cynnias tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the leaſt the common people. Vntill the laſt there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other ſouldiers alſo that ran ſtraight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, or ever as he was comming againe to himſelfe out of this traunce. This Zopyrus drewe out a Sparthian ſworde he wore by his ſide, to ſtrike off his head. But Pyrrus caſt ſuch a grimme countenance vpon him betwene his eyes that made him ſo afraid, and his hand ſo to ſhake therewith: that being thus amazed, he did not ſtrike him right in the place where he ſhould haue cut off his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne, ſo that he was a great while ere he could cut off his head. The matter was ſtraight blowen abroad among ſtdiuerſe: whereupon Alcyoneus the king Antigonus ſon, running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he preſently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friendes, and Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking vpon it, when he knew it, laide vpon his ſonne with his ſtaffe, and called him cruell murderer, and vnnaturall barbarous beaſt: and ſo hiding his eyes with his cloke, wept for pitie, remembring the fortune of his grandfather Antigonus, and of his father Demetrius) and then cauſed Pyrrus head and bodie to be honorably burned and buried. Afterwards Alcyoneus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus ſonne) in very poore ſtate, and vp with a poore ſhort cloke: vſed him very courteouſly with gentle words, and brought him to his father. Antigonus ſeeing his ſonne bringing of him, ſaide vnto him: this part now (ſonne) is better then the firſt, and pleaſeth me a great deale more. But yet thou haſt not done as thou ſhouldeſt for thou ſhouldeſt haue taken from him his beggerly cloke he weareth, which doth more ſhame vs that are the gainers, then him that is the looſer. After he had ſpoken theſe wordes, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good ſort, ſent him home with honourable conuoy into his Realme of EPYRVS. Furthermore, ceazing all Pyrrus campe and army, he courteouſly receiued all his friendes and ſeruantes.

THE LIFE OF Caius Marius.

IT is not knowen what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintius Sertorius, who had all SPAYNE in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the citie of CORINTHE. For this name of Achaicus that was giuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio: and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all surnames giuen them, by reason of the conquests they wan. By this reason Posidonius thinketh to ouercome them that say, that the third name the ROMAINES haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out so, said he, then it must needes follow that they which haue two names, should haue no proper name. But on the other side also, he doth not consider that by the like reason he should say, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her first name, which Posidonius iudgeth to be the proper name of the ROMAINES. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the house or family, as of the POMPEIANS, of the MANLIANS, and of the CORNELIANS, like as the HERACLIDES and the PELOPIDES are amongst the GRECIANS: and the other is a surname taken of the deedes, or of the nature, forme, or shape of the bodie, or of some other like accident, as are these surnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Euen as amongest the GRECIANS likewise, Mnemon, which signifieth hauing good memory: Grypos, hauing a crooked nose: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuersitie of custome would deliuer obiection sufficient to the contrarie, to him that listed. And furthermore, as touching the fauour of Marius face, we haue seene an image of his in marble at RAVENNA, a citie of the GAVLES, which doth liuely represent that rough seueritie of nature and maner which they say was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature and giuen to the warres, and hauing followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authoritie, he could not bridle his anger and cholericke nature. And they say furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vsed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockery to studie to learne the tongue, the masters whereof liued in bondage vnder others. After his second triumph, in the dedication of a certaine temple, hee made Greeke plaies to shewe the ROMAINES pastime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but sit downe only, and went his way straight. Wherefore me thinkes, that as Plato was wont to say oft vnto Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was of a curriſh nature, had his head euer occupied, & too ſeuere: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do ſacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could haue perſwaded Marius to haue ſacrificed to the Muſes, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to ſay, that he had known the Greeke tongue) to ſo many famous and glorious deedes as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioyned ſo vnfortunate and miſerable an end as he made, through his choler and extreame ambition, at ſuch yeares, and through an vnſatiable couetouſnes, which like boyſterous windes made him to make ſhipwracke of all, in a moſt cruell, bloudy, and vnnatural age. The which is eaſily knowen in reading the diſcourſe of his doings. Firſt of all he was of a meane houſe, borne of poore parents by father and mother, that got their liuings by ſweat of their browes. His father as himſelfe, was called Caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cauſe why he beganne ſo late to haunt the citie, and to learne the ciuilitie and manners of ROME, hauing bene brought vp alwaies before in a litle poore village called CIRCEITON, within the territory of the citie of ARPOS: where he led a hard countrylife, ſtil of thoſe that liued pleaſantly and finely in the cities, but otherwiſe well reformed, and vnto the maners of the ancient ROMAINES. The firſt iourney he made vnto the warres againſt the CELTIBERIANS in SPAYNE, vnder Scipio AFRICAN, when he went to beſiege the citie of NVMANTIA: where his captaines in ſhort time found that he was a better ſouldier then any other of his companions. For he did maruellous eaſily receiue the reformation of manners, and the diſcipline of warres, which Scipio aduaunced amongeſt his ſouldiers that were ill trained before, and giuen ouer to all pleaſure. And they ſay, that in the ſight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and ſlew him: vpon which occaſion Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many courteſies and pleaſures. But ſpecially one day aboue the reſt, hauing made him ſuppe with him at his table, ſome one after ſupper falling in talke of Captaines that were in ROME at that time: one that ſtood by Scipio, asked him (either becauſe in deede he ſtoode in doubt, or elſe for that he would curry fauour with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMAINES ſhould haue after his death, like vnto him. Scipio hearing

Marius by him, gentlely clapped him vpon his ſhoulder, and ſaid: peraduenture this ſhall be. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to ſhew from his youth that one day he ſhould come to be a great man, and the other alſo for wiſely coniecturing the end, by ſeeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned ſo, that theſe wordes of Scipio (by report) aboue all things encouraged Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene ſpoken by the oracle of ſome god, and made him bold to deale in matters of ſtate and common wealth: where by meanes of the fauor & countenance Cæcilius Metellus gaue him (whoſe houſe his father and he had alwaies followed and honoured) he obtained the office of Tribuneſhip. In this office he preferred a law touching the manner how to giue the voices in election of the Magiſtrates, which did ſeeme to take from the nobilitie the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Conſull Cotta ſtepped vp againſt it, and perſwaded the Senate to reſiſt that lawe, and not ſuffer it to be auctoriſed, and therewithall preſently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reaſon of his doings. So was it agreed vpon in the Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abaſhed at any thing, as ſome other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begunne to come into the world as he did, & hauing no other notable calling or qualitie in him, ſauing hautie only to commend him: but taking boldneſſe of himſelfe (as the noble actes he after wards did, gaue ſhew of his valure) he openly threatned the Conſull Cotta to ſende him to priſon, if he did not preſently withdrawe the concluſion he had cauſed to be reſolued vpon. The Conſull then turning himſelfe vnto Cæcilius Metellus, asked him how he liked it? Metellus ſtarting vp, ſpake in the behalfe of the Conſull: and then Marius calling a ſergeant out, commanded him to take Metellus ſelfe, and to carrie him to priſon. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: ſo that the Senate when all was done were compelled to call backe the concluſion that before was taken. Then Marius returned with great honour into the market place among the aſſembly of the people, cauſed this lawe to paſſe and be authoriſed: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a ſtout man and ſuch a one, as would not ſtoupe for any feare, nor ſhrinke for baſhfulnes, but would ſtand for the Senate in fauour of the people. Notwithſtanding, hee ſhortly after changed opinion, altered the first, by an other act he made. For when an other went about to haue a law made, to distribute corne vnto euery citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently against it, and ouerthrew it: so that thereby he came to be a like honored and esteemed of either partie, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the preiudice of the common wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he sued for the chiefest office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two sortes: the first is called Ædilitas Curulis, so named because of certaine chaires that haue crooked feete, vpon which they sit when they giue audience. The other is of lesse dignitie, and that is called Ædilitas popularis: and when they had chosen the first and greater Ædilis at ROME, they presently proceede the same day also in the market place vnto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainely that he was put by the chiefest of the Ædiles, turned againe straight yet to demaund the second: but this was misliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too shameles, and too presumptuous a man. So that in one selfe day he had two denials and repulses, which neuer man but him selfe before had. And neuertheles, all this could not cut his combe, but shortly after he sued also for the Prætorshippe, and hee lacked but litle of the deniall of that: yet in the ende, being last of all chosen, he was accused to haue bribed the people, and bought their voices for money. And surely amongest many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of CASSIVS SABACON within the barres where the election is made, running to and fro among them that gaue their voices, because this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the iudges, and Sabacon was examined vpon it. Whereunto he aunswered, that for the great extreame heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for colde water to drinke, and that this man had brought him some in a potte where he was, howbeit that he went his way as soone as euer he had drunke. This Sabacon was afterwardes put out of the Senate by the next Censors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamie, for that he was periured in iudgement, or because he was so abiect and giuen to his pleasure. Caius Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did alleage for his excuse, that the law and custome did dispence with the Patrone, to beare witnes against his follower & client, and he was quit by the iudges. For the ROMAINES do vsually call those Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then them selues into their handes: saying, that Marius predecessors, and Marius himselfe, had euer bene followers of the house of the HERENNIANS. The iudges receiued his aunswere, and allowed thereof. But Marius spake against it, alleaging, that since he had receiued this honor to beare office in the common wealth, he was now growen from this base condition, to be any more a follower of any man: the which was not true in all. For euery office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his posteritie to be vnder the patronage of another, nor doth discharge him from the dutie of honoring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the lawe doth permit to sit in the crooked chaire called Curulis, that is to say, carried vpon a chaire through the citie. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the iudges were against him all they could: yet in the end for all that, at the last hearing of his matter, Marius, contrarie to all mens opinions, was discharged, because the iudges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He vied himselfe very orderly in his office of Prætorshippe, and after his yeare was out, when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot, SPAINE fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuer of Bætis: where it is reported that he skowred all the country thereabouts of theeues and robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very cruell and sauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuill manner and fashion of life of the inhabitantes there. For the SPANYARDS were of opinion euen at that time, that it was a goodly thing to liue vpon theft and robberie. At his returne to ROME out of SPAYNE, desiring to deale in matters of the common wealth, he saw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which those that were at that time in credite and authoritie, did carie the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great account of his constancie and noble minde they found in him, of his great paines and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicitie of his life: which were causes to bring him to honour and preferment, insomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noble house of the Cæsars, and aunt vnto Iulius Cæsar: who afterwardes came to be the

chiefeſt man of all the ROMAINES, and who by reaſon of that alliance betwene them ſeemed in ſome things to follow Marius, as we haue written in his life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be iudged by an acte he did, putting him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons. For his ſhankes and legges were full of great ſwollen veines, and being angrie becauſe it was no pleaſant thing to beholde: hee determined to put him ſelfe into the handes of ſurgeons to be cured. And firſt, laying out one of his legges to the ſurgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in the like caſe: but patiently abode all the extreame paines a man muſt of neceſſitie feele being cut, without ſturring, groning or ſighing, ſtill keeping his countenance, and ſaid neuer a word. But when the ſurgeon had done with his firſt legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not giue it him: nay ſaid he, I ſee the cure is not worth the paine I muſt abide. Afterwardes, Cæcilius Metellus the Conſull, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make warre with king Iugurthe, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, ſeeing notable good ſeruice to be done, and good occaſion to ſhew his manhood, was not of mind in this voyage to increaſe Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieutenantes did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him forth for his Lieutenant, but fortune her ſelfe that preſented him a fit occaſion to raiſe him to greatneſſe, and (as it were) did leade him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he could doe. And for this cauſe therefore, he endeuoured himſelfe to ſhew all the poſſible proofes of valiantneſſe and honour he could. For, the warres being great continually there, he neuer for feare refuſed any attempt or ſeruice, how dangerous or painfull ſoeuer it were, neither diſdained to take any ſeruice in hand, were it neuer ſo litle: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wiſedome and foreſight, in that which was to be done, and ſtriuing with the meaneſt ſouldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, wanne the goodwill and fauour of euery man. For to ſay truly, it is a great comfort and refreſhing to ſouldiers that labour, to haue companions that labour willingly with them. For they thinke, that their company labouring with them, doth in maner take away the compulſion and neceſſitie. Furthermore, it pleaſeth the ROMAINE ſouldier maruellouſly to ſee the Generall eate open of the ſame bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himſelfe is the firſt man to ſet his hande to any worke when a trench is to be caſt, or their campe to be fortified. For they doe not ſo much eſteeme the Captaines, that honour and reward them: as they doe thoſe that in dangerous attempts labour, and venture their liues with them. And further, they doe farre better loue them that take paines with them, then thoſe that ſuffer them to liue idle by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue & goodwils of his ſouldiers: he ſtraight filled all LIBYA and the citie of ROME with his glory, ſo that he was in euery mans mouth. For they that were in the campe in AFRICKE, wrote vnto them that were in ROME, that they ſhould neuer ſee the end of theſe warres againſt this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and choſe him Conſull. Theſe things miſliked Metellus very much, but ſpecially the misfortune that came vpon Turpilius did maruellouſly trouble him: which fell out in this ſort. Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea he and all his parentes had followed Metellus in this warre, being maſter of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernour ouer the citie of VACCA, a goodly great citie: and he vſing the inhabitants of the ſame very gentlely & courteouſly, miſtruſting nothing till he was fallen into the hands of his enemies through their treaſon. For they had brought king Iugurthe into their city vnknowen to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the king, and let him goe his way ſafe. And this was the cauſe why they accuſed Turpilius of treaſon. Marius being one of his iudges in the councell, was not contented to be bitter to him himſelfe, but moued many of the Councell beſides to be againſt him. So that Metellus by the voices of the people, was driuen againſt his will to condemne him to ſuffer as a traitor: and ſhortly after, it was found and proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned & put to death. To ſay truly, there was not one of the Councell but were very ſory with Metellus, who maruelous impatiently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him: for he purſued his death, and was not aſhamed to make open vaunts, that he had hanged a halter about Metellus necke, to reuenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltleſſe had cauſed to be put to death.

death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they say, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, sayd vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, & returne to ROME to sue for the Consulship, and canst thou not be contented to tary to be Consull with my sonne? Now his sonne at that time was but a boy. But whatsoeuer the matter ment, Marius left him not so, but laboured for leaue all he could possible. And Metellus after he had vsed many delayes and excuses, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue dayes onely before the day of election of the Consuls. Wherefore Marius made hast, and in two dayes and a night came from the camp to VTICA vpon the sea side, which is a maruellous way from it: and there before he tooke ship, did sacrifices vnto the goddes, and the Soothsayer told him, that the goddes by the signes of his sacrifices, did promise him vncredible prosperitie, and so great, as he himselfe durst not hope after. These wordes made Marius hart greater. Whereupon he hoysed sayle, and hauing a prosing good gale of winde in the poope of the ship, passed the saes in foure dayes, and being landed, rode post to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to shew himselfe vnto the people: who were maruellous desirous to see him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accusations which he obiected against Metellus, in the end he besought the people to choose him Consull, promising that within few dayes he would either kill, or take king Iugurthe prisoner. Whereupō he was chosen Consull without any contradiction. And so soone as he was proclaimed, he began immediatly to leauie men of warre, causing many poore men that had nothing, and many slaues also, to be enrolled against the order of auncient custome: where other Captaines before him did receiue no such manner of men, and did no more suffer vnworthy men to be souldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goods behind them, as a pledge of their good seruice abroad in the warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his stout proude wordes, full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offende the noble men in the citie. For he proclaimed it euery where abroad as it were, that his Consulship was a spoyle he had gotten of the effeminate rich noble men through his valiantnesse, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for seruice of the common wealth, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images and statues of others, were those that recommended him to the people, nor were his strength. And oft times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Scipio, both noble men, and of great houses, who hauing bene generals of the ROMAINE armie, had very ill fortune in the country of LIBYA: he called them cowardes, and simple souldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their auncesters would rather haue wished to haue left their children that came of them like vnto himselfe, then such as they had bene: considering that they themselues had wonne honour and glory, not for that they were descended of noble bloud, but through their deserued vertue and valiant deedes. Now Marius spake not these wordes in a foolish brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the nobilitie for nothing: but the common people being very glad to see him blame and despight the Senate, and measuring alwayes the greatnesse of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward still not to spare the nobility, & to reproue the great men, so that he euer held with the communalty. And furthermore, when he was passed ouer again into AFRICKE, it spighted Metellus to the hart, because that he hauing ended the warre, that there remained almost no more to take or winne, Marius should come in hast to take away the glory and triumph out of his hands, hauing sought to rise & increase in vnthankefulnesse towardes him. He would not come to him therefore, but went an other way, & left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliuer the same vnto him. Howbeit the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end vpon Marius owne necke. For Sylla tooke out of Marius hands, the honour of ending this warre: euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, and after what sort, I will repeat it in few wordes, because we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Iugurthe, vnto whom he gaue great aide, whilest he made warres with the ROMAINES, because he hated his vnfaithfulnesse, & feared least he would make himselfe greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurthe had fled, and wandered vp and down in euery place, he was constrained of very necessitie to cast his last hope and anicker vpon him, as his final refuge, and so repayre vnto him. King Bocchus receiued him rather for shame, because he durst not punish him, then for any loue or good will he bare him: & hauing him in his hands, seemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and secretly to write the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practised treason vnder hand, and sent priuely for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæstor (to say, high treasurer) vnder Marius, and of whom he had receiued certaine pleasures in those warres. Sylla trusting to this barbarous king, went at his sending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promise, and altered his minde: For hauing many dayes in doubt with himselfe how to resolue, whether he should deliuer king Iugurthe, or keepe Sylla himselfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended treason, and deliuered king Iugurthe aliue into Syllaes handes. And this was the first originall cause of the pestilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwardes betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowen the citie of ROME, and to haue rased the foundation of the empire vnto the ground. For many enuying the glorie of Marius, gaue it out euery where that this acte of the taking of king Iugurthe, appertained onely vnto Sylla: & Sylla himselfe caused a ring to be made, which he ware commonly, and had grauen vpon the stone of the same how Bocchus deliuered Iugurthe into his handes. And afterwardes he made it alwayes his seale to despite Marius with all, who was an ambitious and proude man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glorie of his doings: and Sylla did it especially at the procurement of enemies and ill willers, who gaue the glorie of the beginning and chiefe exploites of the warre, vnto Metellus, and the last and finall conclusion vnto Sylla, to the end that the people should not haue Marius in so great estimation and good opinion, as they had before. But for this enuie, detraction, and hatred against Marius, was soone after extinguished and trodden vnder foote, by reason of the great daunger that fell vpon all ITALIE out of the West: and they neuer spake of it afterwardes, knowing that the common wealth stoode in neede of a good Captaine, and that they began to looke about, and consider who should be that great Pylot, that might saue and preserue it, from so exceeding daungerous storme of warre. For there was not a noble man of all the auntient houses of ROME, that durst vndertake to doe himselfe to demaunde the Consulship: but Marius being absent, was chosen Consull the second time. For Iugurthe was no sooner taken, but newes came to ROME of the coming downe of the TEVTONS, and of the CIMBRES, the which would not be beleeued at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was said to be in their company, and of the vncredible force and power of armies which was iustified to come also: but afterwards they knew plainly, that the rumour that ranne abroad was lesse, then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thousand fighting men all armed, who brought with them an other multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandered vp and downe seeking countrys and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard say the GAVLES had done of old time, who leauing their owne country, came, and had possessed the best part of Italie which they had taken away from the THVSCANS. Now to say truely, no man knew of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendship with any other people, as also because they came out of a farre country, as a cloud of people that spread all ouer GAVLE & ITALIE. It was doubted much that they came out of GERMANIE dwelling about the North sea: and this they coniectured by view of the greatnesse of their bodies, and also for that they had darke blew eyes and red, besides that the GRECIANS in their tonings do call theeues and robbers, Cimbri. Other say that Celtica, for the great length and largenesse of the country, stretching it selfe from the coast of the great Ocean sea and from the North parts, drawing towards the mariisses Mœotides, and the East runneth into SCITHIA or TARTARIA PONTICA: and that for neighbourhood these two nations ioyned together, and went out of their country, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many sundry times, marching yearely in the spring further and further into the country. And so by continuance of time, they passed by force of armes through all the firme land of Europe, and that for this cause, although they had many particular names according to the diuersitie of their nations, yet all this masse and multitude of people gathered together, were called

notwithstanding, the army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would say, the CELTOTARTARIANS. Other hold opinió that the natió of the CIMMERIANS, who were knowen in old time for auncient GRECIANS, the one part of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuē out of their country for some ciuill dissention) were compelled by the TARTARES to passe beyond the marisses Mœotides, into the countrys of ASIA, vnder the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the residue of them which were a farre greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furthest partes of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Ocean sea, in a darke shadowed country, couered with wonderfull forrests, of such length, and so great and thicke, and the trees so high, that the sunne can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyne hard vpon the great forrest of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder such a climate, where the pole is of such a height by the inclination of the circles equidistant, which they call Parallelles, that it is not farre from the point that aunswereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the nights are equinoctiall. They do deuide all their time in two partes, the which giueth Homer occasion to sayne, that when Vlysses would call vpon the dead, he went into the country of the CIMMERIANS, as into the country of hell. And this is the cause why they say these barbarous people left their owne countrys to come into ITALIE, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwardes they say (and not without great likelyhood) that they were named CIMBRES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any assured troth of history. And as for the multitude of men, the most part of historiographers do write, that they were rather mo, then lesse then we haue spoken of: and that they were so hardy and valiant, that nothing could stand before them, they did so great things by the strength of their handes where they fought with any, so violently, and so sodainly, that they seemed to be like a lightening fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durst resist them, but scraped together and caried away, all that they found, and ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE Captaines appointed gouernours to keepe that which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyond the mountaines, who with great armies were shamefully ouerthrown by them. The cowardlynesse of those, whō they had ouercome, was the chiefest cause that moued them to direct their iourney to ROME. For when they had conquished the first the fought withall, and gotten great richesse also: they were so fleshed by them, that they determined to stay no where before they had destroyed ROME, and sacked ITALIE. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all parts, sent for Marius to giue him the conduction and leading of these warres, and chose him Consull the second time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the law, that did expresly forbid any man to be chosen being absent, and vntill also a certaine time appointed had past betweene the vacation and election, before they could choose him officer twise in one office. Some alledged this law, of intent to hinder the election. But the people repulsed them, obiecting to the contrary: that this was not the first time the law had giuen place to the benefit of the common wealth, and that the occasion offered to abrogate the law at that present was no lesse, then former occasions by the which they chose Scipio Consull, against the course and time appointed by the law, not for any feare they stood in to lose their owne country, but for the desire they had to destroy the country of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his armie againe out of LIBYA into ITALIE, tooke possession of his Consulship the first day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES begin their yeare) and therewithall made his triūph into the city of ROME, shewing that to the ROMAINES, which they thought neuer to haue seene: and that was, king Iugurthe prisoner, who was so subtill a man, and could so well frame himselfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and subtiltie was of so great courage besides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliue. But it is said, that after he was led in this triumph, he fell mad straight vpon it. And the pompe of the triumphe being ended, he was caried into prison, where the sergeants for hast to haue the spoyle of him, tare his apparell by force from off his backe: and because they would take away his rich gold eare rings that hung at his eares, they pulled away with them the typpe of his eare, and then cast him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he sayd: O Hercules, how cold are your stoues. He liued there yet six dayes, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwayes to pu long his miserable life vnto the last houre: the which was a iust deserued punishment for his wicked life. In this triumphe were caried (as they say) three thousand and seuen hundred pound weight in gold, & of siluer nigots, fiue thousand seuen hūdred & lxxv. pound weight and more in gold and ready coyne, eight and twentie thousand and seuen hundred crowns. After this triumphe Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the companie with his triumphing robe, either because he forgot it, or else of a grosse and vnciuill arrogancie: but perceiuing that all the assemblie misliked of it, he tooke it dainly, and tooke his long Consuls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place.

Furthermore Marius departing to go to the warres, thought to traine his army by the way and to harden his souldiers vnto labour, causing them to runne euery way, making great iourneys, compelling ech souldier to cary his own furniture, and to prepare him necessaries & victuals to finde himselfe withall: so that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, and called such as were painfull and willing to do that which they were commaunded without grudging, Marius moyles. Other notwithstanding, do shew an other cause and beginning of this prouerbe.

For they say, that Scipio lying at the siege of the city of NVMANTIA, would not only take view of the armour and horses of seruice that were in his armie, but also of the moyles and other beastes of burden, because he would see how they were kept & furnished. So Marius brought his horse and moyle to the muster which he kept himselfe, fatte, fayre, and very well liking, and his moyles haire so slike and smooth, and there withall so lusty and trimme, as none of the rest were like vnto them. Scipio tooke great pleasure to see these beastes so well kept, and in good plighte: in somuch as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon this grew this maner of talke was taken vp euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painfull, and giuen to sore labour, making as though they would praise him, they call him Marius moyle. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these barbarous people (like in force to the beating backe of the sea) turned their first fury towardes SPAYNE: and that he in the meane space had time and leasure to traine and exercise his souldiers, to make them bold, and withall, himselfe throughly knowen amongest them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to feare nor disobey: then they found his rough commaunding, and sharpe seueritie in punishing as slacke their duetie, both profitable and very necessarie, besides that it was also iust and reasonable. Againe, his great fury, his sharpe wordes, and his fierce lookes, after they had a while bene vsed to them, by litle and litle they seemed nothing so fearefull to them, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleased the souldiers more then all the rest, was his iustice and vpright dealing: whereof they report such an example: Marius had a nephew of his in his campe called Caius Lusius, who had charge of mē in the army. This Lusius was taken for a man of honest man, sauing that he had this fowle vice in him, that he would be sodainly in loue with fayre young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trimme young stripling, called Trebonius, that serued vnder him, and hauing many times lewdly entised him, and neuer could obtaine his purpose, at the last sent for him one night by his seruaunt. The young man would not disobey his Captaine being sent for, but presently went vnto him. When he was entred into his tent, and that his Captaine did striue with all his force to do him villanny: he drew out his sword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of the camp: who so soone as he returned, caused the martiall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he himself began to tell his tale himself, & to name many witnesses, who had both seene & knowen how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonour, and how that he had continually resisted his abhominable motion, and would neuer yeeld himselfe vnto him, for any gift or present he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vsed to be giuen to them that in a day of battell haue done some valiant deede, and he himselfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble act, and at such a time, as good and examples were requisite. This iudgement of Marius being caried to ROME, stood him to great good purpose towardes the obtaining of his third Consulship: besides also that they looked for the comming backe of these barbarous people about the spring, with whom the ROMAINE souldiers would not fight vnder any other Captaine, then Marius. Howbeit they came not so soone againe as they looked for them, but Marius passed ouer also the yeare of his third Consulship. So time comming about againe for the election of new Consuls, and his companion also being dead: he was driuen to go himselfe vnto ROME, leauing the charge of his camp in his absence, vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that sued for the Consulship: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communalty vnder his girdle as he would himselfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perswaded the people to choose Marius Consull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying that he would none of it, though the people chose him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traytor, crying out, that his refusall in such a danger and time of necessity, was an apparant part to betray the common wealth. It was found straight that this was a grosse packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could see day at a litle hole. Neuertheless, the people considering that their present troubles required Marius skill & good fortune in the warres, they made him Consull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Luctatius Consull with him, a mã that was greatly honored of the nobility, and not misliked also of the common people. Marius hearing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great speed, and fortifying his camp by the riuer of Rhone, he brought great prouision of all kiddes of victuals thither with him, least being straighted by lacke thereof, he should be forced to come to battell at any other time, but euen as he would himselfe, and as it should seeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of victuals vnto his camp by sea was very long, and dangerous, and a maruellous great charge besides: he made it very short and easie by this meanes. The mouth of the riuer of Rhone had gathered together so much mudde, and such store of sand, which the waues of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was become very high and deepe: so as the banckes made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and dangerous for great shippes of burden that came from the sea. Marius considering this matter, set his men a worke while they had nothing to do, & made them digge a large trench and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great part of the riuer, and caried it to a conuenient place of the coast, where the water fell into the sea by an open gulfe, whereby he made able to cary the greatest shippes that were: and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not being troubled with windes nor waues. The channell carieth yet his name, and is called Marius channell or trench. These barbarous people diuided themselues into two armies to passe into ITALIE, so that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMBRES, to go through high GERMANIE, and to force that passage which Catulus kept: and vnto the other part, which were the TEVTONS and AMBRONS, to passe through the country of the GENOVAINS by the sea side against Marius. Now the CIMBRES hauing the greater compasse to go about, stayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS going their way first, had in few dayes dispatched their iourney they had to go, to bring them to the camp where the ROMAINES lay, vnto whom they presented themselues by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to behold, and their cryes and voyces farre contrary vnto other mens. For they tooke in a maruellous deale of ground in length to camp vpon, and so came forth to find Marius, and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their braging defiances, but kept his men together within his camp, taking on terribly with them that would rashly take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choller would needs go forth to fight, calling them traytors to their country. For sayd he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glory, neither to winne two triumphes nor victories for our selues: but we must seeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great shower of armes from vs, & this lightning and tempest, that it ouercome not all ITALIE. These wordes he spake vnto the priuate Captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauiour and quality. But as for the common souldiers, he made them stand vpon the trenches of his camp, one after an other to behold the enemies, and to acquaint themselues with sight of their their countenaunce, and marching, and not to be afrayed of their voyces to heare them of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order & ordinary viewing in time he made the things that seemed fearefull vnto his mẽ at the first sight, to be after very familiar: so that they made no more wondring at them. For he iudged, the thing indeede is true, that a rare and new matter neuer seene before, for lacke of iudgement and derstanding, maketh things vnknowen to vs, more horrible & fearefull then they are: & contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare, & terrour of those things, which acquainted to looke vpon these barbarous people, it did not onely diminish some part former feare of the ROMAINE souldiers: but furthermore they whetting their choller fierce vntollerable threates and bragges of these barbarous brutish people, did set their a fire to fight with them, because they did not only waste & destroy all the country about but besides that, came to giue assault euen vnto their camp with such a boldnesse, that MAAINE souldiers could no longer suffer them, and they letted not to speake wordes that to Marius eares himselfe. What cowarlinesse hath Marius euer knowen in vs, that he vs thus frõ fighting, & vnder locke & key as it were, in the gard of porters, as if we were men? Let vs therefore shew our selues like men, and go aske him if he looke for any other diers besides our selues to defend ITALIE: and if he haue determined to employ vs as onely, when he would cast a trench to rid away the mudde, or to turne a riuer contrary therein hath he onely hitherunto employed vs in great labour, & they are the notable he afrayed they should take him, as they did Carbo & Capio, whom the enemies haue ouer wen? He must not be afrayed of that: for he is a Captaine of an other manner of valour putation then they were, and his army much better then theirs was. But howsoeuer it were it much better in proouing to loose something, then to be idle, & to suffer our confederates to be destroyed and sacked before our eyes. Marius was maruellous glad to his men complaine thus, and did comfort them, & told them that he did nothing mistrust courage & valiantnesse: howbeit that through the counsell of certaine prophecies and of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for victory. For he euer caried a SYRIAN wo in a litter about with him called Martha, with great reuerence, whom they sayd had rit of propheesie in her: and that he did euer sacrifice vnto the gods by her order, & at such as she willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman went first to speake with the Senate these matters, & did foretell and prognosticate what should follow. But the Senate wo heare her, and made her to be driuen away. Whereupon she went vnto the women, and them see proofe of some things she vaunted of, & specially Marius wife, at whose feete set one day in assembly of the common playes, to see the swordplayers fight for life and for she told her certainly which of them should ouercome. Whereupõ this Lady sent to her husband Marius, who made great reckning of her, and caried her euen in a litter him whersoeuer he went. She was alwayes at Marius sacrifices, apparelled in a gowne ple in graine, clasped to her with clasps, and held a speare in her hand wound all about nosegayes, and garlands of flowers tyed on with laces. This manner of gest made many whether Marius shewed this woman openly, beleeuing indeede that she had the gift phecy: or else that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleeue it, to fayning. But that which Alexander the MYNDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing lyto be wondred at. For he sayd there were two of them followed Marius in his warres, that they euer shewed themselues & missed not, whẽ he should winne any great battell, they did know them by latin collers they ware about their neckes, which the souldiers tyed about them, and afterwardes let them go where they would: by reason whereof, they know the souldiers againe, and it seemed also that they saluted them, and were very glad they saw them, & perswaded themselues, that it was a signe & token of good lucke to

For they ſay there were ſeene ſpeares and targets in the night, burning like fire in the ele-

Marius ſtirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to aſſault him: howbeit they were well receiued with ſhot and ſlings, that after they had loſt certaine of their men, they gaue it which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruellous great mul-of people, by the length of time which they tooke to paſſe their way. For it is ſaid they The enemies campe were remouing ſixe daies together. paſsing by his campe, ſixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the AINS campe, they asked them in mockery, if they would write or ſend home any thing their wiues, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all paſſed and and that they continued on their iorney ſtill, Marius alſo raiſed his campe, and went and ed them faire and ſoftly foote by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neere as he , alwaies fortifying his campe very well, and euer chooſing ſtrong places of ſituation tage to lodge in, that they might be ſafe in the night time. Thus they marched on in , vntill they came vnto the citie of AIX, from whence they had not farre to go, but entred ſtraight into the mountaines of the Alpes. Wherefore Marius prepared now to with them: and choſe out a place that was very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge his campe howbeit there lacked water. And they ſay he did it of purpoſe, to the ende to quicken his courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and tolde him that they ſhould ſtand in danger to abide maruellous thirſt if they lodged there. Whereunto he made anſwer: Marius bolde words to his ſouldiers, and their anſwer.

ing them the riuer that ran hard by the enemies campe, ſaying withall, that they muſt hither and buie drinke with their bloud. The ſouldiers replied againe: and why then doe not lead vs thither, whileſt our bloud is yet moiſte? he gently anſwered them againe: be-the firſt thing we do, we muſt fortifie our campe. The ſouldiers, though they were an-with him, yet they obeyed him: but the ſlaues hauing neither drinke for themſelues, nor their cattell, gathered together a great troope of them, and went towards the riuer: ſome them caryng axes, other hatchets, other ſwords and ſpeares, with their pots to cary water, mining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwiſe they could not come by it. A of the barbarous people at the firſt fought with them, becauſe the moſt part of their com-were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were ſtill in the bathe waſhing them-, finding in that place many ſprings of hot naturall bathes. Thus the ROMAINES found of the barbarous people making merry, & taking their pleaſure about theſe bathes, for great delight they tooke to conſider the pleaſantneſſe of the place: but when they heard noiſe of them that fought, they began to runne one after an other vnto the place from ence the noiſe came. Wherfore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keep the RO-AINE ſouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their ſlaues ſhould haue bin ne of the barbarous people: and moreouer, becauſe the valianteſt ſouldiers of their enes called the AMBRONS (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cæpio, two ROMAINE

Captaines with their armies, and that made of themselues thirty thousand fighting men [illegible] to armes, being very heauy of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwise valiant and courageous fellowes, and more liuely then they were wont to be, by reason of the wine they had drunke. They ran not furiously to fight out of order, neither did they crie confusedly, but matching all together in good array, making a noise with their harnesse after one sorte; they oft rehearsed their owne name AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS which was, either to call one an other of them, or else to feare the ROMAINS with their name only. The ITALIANS also on the other side, being the first that came downe to fight with were the LIGVRIANS, dwelling vpon the coast of Genoa, who hearing this noise [illegible] of theirs, plainly vnderstanding them: answered them againe with the like noise and crie GVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, LIGVRIANS, saying that it was the true surname of all their [illegible] And so before they ioyned together, this crie was redoubled many a time on either side the Captaines of both parts made their souldiers crie out all together, contending for one against an other, who should crie it out lowdest. This contention of crying, inflamed souldiers courages the more. Now the AMBRONS hauing the riuer to passe, were by meanes put out of order, and before they could put themselues in battell ray againe, after had passed the riuer, the LIGVRIANS ran with great furie to set vpon the formost: and them, (to aide the LIGVRIANS that had begun the charge) the ROMAINES themselues also vpon the AMBRONS, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon these barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, and flie. So the great slaughter they made, fortuned vpon the bancke of the riuer, whereinto they thrust one other in such sorte, that all the riuer ran bloud, being filled with dead bodies. And they could get ouer the riuer againe, and were on the other side, durst not gather together any to stand to defence: so as the ROMAINES slew them, and draue them into their campe, vnto their cariage. Then their women came out against them with swordes and axes in hands, gtinding their teeth: and crying out for sorrow and anger, they charged as well their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chased them: the one as traitors, and the as enemies. Furthermore, they thrust themselues amongest them that fought, and with force to plucke the ROMAINES targets out of their hands, and tooke holde of their swords bare handed, abiding with an inuincible courage to be hacked & mangled with swords. And thus was the first battell giuen (as they say) by the riuers side, rather by vnlooked for, then by any set purpose, or through the generals counsel. Now the ROMAINS after they had ouercome the most parte of the AMBRONS, retiring back by reason they had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had giuen such an ouerthrow) songs of victory and triumphe, nor make good cheere in their tents one with an other, least of all sleepe: (which is the best and sweetest refreshing for men that haue fought hard) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, because their [illegible] was not trenched and fortified, and because they knew also that there remained almost innumerable thousands of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: besides also, that the AMBRONS that had fled and scaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with lowd cries which were nothing like mens lamentations and sighes, but rather like wilde beasts bellowing and roaring. So that the bellowing of such a great multitude of beastly people, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running water to rebounde againe of the sound and eccho of their cryes maruellously: by reason whereof all the valley that lay betweene both, thundered to heare the horrible and fearefull tremblings. This made the ROMAINE souldiers afeard, and Marius himselfe in some doubt: because he looked to haue bene fought withall the same night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithstanding, the barbarous people did not assault them that night, nor the next following, but only prepared themselues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius hauing that there was aboue the place where they were camped, certaine caues and little valleys couered with wood: he secretly sent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thousand footmen well armed, and commanded him to keepe close in ambush, vntill he sawe that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set vpon their rereward.

The reſidue of his armie, they ſupped when time came, and after ſupper repoſed themſelues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the fielde out of his campe: where he put them in order of battell, ſending his horſmen before to draw the enemies out to skirmiſh. The TEVTONS ſeeing them come, had not the patience to tary till the ROMAINES were come downe into the plaine field to fight without aduantage, but arming themſelues in haſt, and in a rage, ran vp the hill to the ROMAINES, where they ſtood in battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, ſent here and there vnto the priuate Captaines, charging them they ſhould not ſtirre, and onely to temporiſe and forbeare, vntill the enemies came within a ſtones caſt of them: and that they ſhould then throw their dartes at them, and afterwards draw their ſwords, and repulſe the barbarous people with their ſhields. For he did foreſee before, that when they ſhould clime vp againſt the hill (vpon the hanging whereof the ROMAINES had ſet their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their ordre and rankes could ſtand cloſe together to any effect or purpoſe: becauſe they could not haue ſure footing, nor marche aſſuredly, but would eaſily be throwne backward if they were neuer ſo little repulſed, by reaſon of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his men, and therewithall was himſelfe the firſt man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a warriour, and as valiant a ſouldier, as any man in all his armie: beſides, not one amongſt them all would venture further, & be more bolde then himſelfe. So when the ROMAINES had reſiſted them, and ſtaied them ſodainly going with fury to haue wonne the hill, perceiuing themſelues to be repulſed, they gaue back by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field: and then began the formoſt of them to gather together, and to put themſelues in battell raye vpon the plaine, when ſodainly they heard the noiſe and charging of them that were in the taile of their armie. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occaſion when it was offred him, becauſe of the noiſe of the firſt charge comming vp againſt the hils thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambuſh, gaue him aduertiſement therof: whereupon he cauſed his men preſently to ſhew, and running with great cries, came to giue a charge vpon thoſe which were in the taile of the barbarous people, putting the hindmoſt to the ſword. They made their fellowes whoſe backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces, & ſo from man to man, till at the length in ſhort time all their battell began to waue in diſorder: and they made no great reſiſtance, when they ſaw they were ſo charged before and behinde, but began ſtraight to flie for life. The ROMAINES following them hard at the heeles, killed and tooke priſoners aboue a hundred thouſand of them, and tooke moreouer their carts, their tents and all their cariage. Which the whole army by conſent agreed to preſent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, ſauing that which was imbeaſled and conueied away vnder hand. Now, though this was a maruellous honorable & right profitable preſent, yet they thought it not a recompence ſufficient for that he had deſerued, for the valure he had ſhewed of a famous Captaine in leading of his armie, and for the good order he had vſed in this warre: ſo happy thought they themſelues to haue eſcaped ſo great a danger. Notwithſtanding, ſome writers do not agree, that the ſpoile of the barbarous people was giuen vnto Marius: nor that there were alſo ſo great a number of men ſlaine as we haue ſpoken of. For they ſay, that after this battell, the MARSILLIANS did incloſe their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and conſumed vpon the fieldes through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed ſo fat, & ſoke the greaſe ſo deepe in the ſame, that the ſummer following they did beare an vncredible quantitie of all ſorts of frutes. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proued true, that arable land doth waxe fat with ſuch rottenneſſe or putrification. And it is ſaid alſo, that ordinary after great battels, there falleth great ſtore of raine. Either it is by meane of ſome god powring downe pure raine water doth purifie, waſh, and clenſe the ground, defiled & polluted with mans bloud: or elſe it happeneth by naturall cauſe. For that the ouerthrow of ſo many dead bodies, and of the bloud ſpilt, engendreth a moiſt, groſſe, and heauy vapoure, which doth thicken the aire (that by nature is changeable, and eaſie to alter) from a very ſmall or litle beginning, vnto an exceeding great change. After this battell, Marius cauſed the harneſſe and ſpoiles of the barbarous people to be laid aſide, that were left whole and faire to ſight, to beautifie and enrich the pompe of his triumph. Then he cauſed the reſt to be gathered together on a great heape, and laide vpon a ſtake of wood, to make a noble ſacrifice vnto the gods, all his armie being armed about him, crowned with garlands of triumphe, and himſelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuſtome of the ROMAINES in ſuch a caſe, & holding a torche burning in both his hands, which he firſt lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning downe the torch to put fire to the ſtake of wood, they ſaw ſome of his friends a good way off a horſeback, comming poſt vnto him: then ſodainly there was a great ſilence made of all the aſſembly, euery man deſirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come & lighted off their horſes, they ran ſtraight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was choſen Conſull the fifth time: and preſented him the letters ſent him from ROME confirming the ſame. And thus, this new ioy falling out beſides the victorie, the priuate ſouldiers did ſhew the great ioy and pleaſure they tooke in both, with great ſhoutes and beating vpon their harneſſe: and the Captaines alſo, they crowned Marius againe with new garlands of laurell which they put about his head, and that done, he put fire vnder the ſtake of wood, and ended his ſacrifice. But that which neuer ſuffereth men quietly to enioy the good hap of any victorie clearely, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either fortune or ſpight of fatall deſtenie, or elſe the neceſſitie of the naturall cauſes of earthly things: did ſhortly after this great ioy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, who was like a cloude in a faire bright day, and brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went againſt the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keepe the ſtraights of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for paſſing: becauſe that in ſo doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his armie into many partes, and had weakened himſelfe very much if he had taken that course. Wherefore comming a litle on this ſide the Alpes towards ITALIE, he planted himſelfe vpon the riuer of Atheſis, and built a bridge vpon it, to paſſe and repaſſe ouer his men when he would, and ſet vp at either end of the bridge two ſtrong fortes well fortified, that he might more commodiouſly helpe the places on the other ſide of the riuer, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the ſtraights of the mountaines. Now, theſe barbarous people had ſuch a glory in themſelues, and diſdained their enemies ſo much, that more to ſhew their force and boldneſſe, then of any neceſſity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they ſuffred it to ſnow vpon them being ſtarke naked, and to climbe vp to the top of the mountaines, through great heapes of Iſe and ſnow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laide their long broade targets vnder their bodies, and ſlid all along vpon them, ſliding downe the ſteepe high rockes, that had certaine hanging cliffes of an infinite height. In the ende, they came to campe neere vnto the ROMAINES by the riuer ſide, and conſidered how they might paſſe it ouer: and began to fill it vp, tearing downe (like giants) great hilles of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the roots, threw in great peeces of rockes which they had, and whole towers of earth after them, to ſtop and breake the courſe of the riuer. But beſides all this, they threw great timber into the riuer, which being caried downe the ſtreame, came with ſuch a force, & hit againſt the poſtes of the bridge ſo violently, that they ſhaked the ROMAINES bridge maruellouſlie. Whereupon many of the ſouldiers of the great campe were afraide, and forſaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfit good Captaine ſhewe, that he made leſſe account of his owne priuate honour and eſtimation, then he did of the generall honor of all his ſouldiers. For, ſeeing that he could not perſwade his men by any reaſon to tary, and that in this feare they diſlodged in diſorder againſt his will: he himſelfe commanded the ſtanderd bearer of the Eagle to marche on, and ran to the formoſt that were their way, and marched himſelfe before them all, to the intent that the ſhame of this flight ſhould altogether light vpon him, and not vpon his countrie, and that it might appeare the ROMAINES did follow their captaine, & not flie away. The barbarous people therefore aſſayling the forte at the end of the bridge of the riuer of Atheſis, tooke it, and all the men that were in it. And becauſe the ROMAINES defended it like valiant men, and had luſtily ventured their liues to the death for defence of their country: the barbarous people let them go vpon compoſition, which they ſware to keepe faithfully, by their bull of copper. This bull after-was taken when they loſt the battell, and caried (as they ſay) into Catulus Luctatius houſe, as the chiefeſt thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the country open without any defence, ſcattered here and there, and deſtroyed all where they came. Wherupon the ROMAINES ſent for Marius to ROME to go againſt them: and after he was arriued, euerie man thought he ſhould haue entred in triumphe, becauſe alſo the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not do it, either becauſe he would not depriue his ſouldiers and the Captaines that had fought vnder him, of any part of the honour that was due vnto them, they being abſent: or becauſe that he would warrant the people from the preſent danger they were in, by laying aſide the glory of his former victories, into the handes of the good fortune of ROME, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honorable and perfit confirmation of the ſecond. Wherfore, after he had made an oration to the people, and Senate according to the time, he went his way immediatly towards Catulus Luctatius, whoſe comming did comfort him much: and ſent alſo for his armie that was yet in GAVLE beyond the mountaines. And after his army was come, he paſſed the riuer of PO, to keepe the barbarous people from hurting ITALIE on this ſide the PO. Now, the CIMBRES ſtill deferred to giue battell becauſe they looked for the TEVTONS, and ſaid: that they maruelled much what they ment to tary ſo long: either becauſe they knew not indeed of their ouerthrow, or elſe for that they would not ſeeme to know it, becauſe they handled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deaths. At the length, they ſent vnto Marius to aske him lands and townes ſufficient to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambaſſadors what brethren they ment. They anſwered, that they were the TEVTONS. Whereat the ſtanders by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, ſaying. Care not for thoſe brethren ſaid he, for we haue giuen them ground enough, which they will keep for euer. Theſe Ambaſſadors found his mock ſtraight, and began to reuile and threaten him, that the CIMBRES ſhould preſently make him repent it, and the TEVTONS ſo ſoone as they arriued. Why, ſaid Marius vnto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honeſty in you, if you could go your way and not ſalute them, ſince they are your brethren. And as he ſpake theſe wordes, he commanded his men to bring him the kings of the TEVTONS bound and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQVANI. The CIMBRES vnderſtanding this by reporte of their Ambaſſadors, preſently marched towards Marius, who ſtirred not at all, but only fortified and kept his campe. They ſay that it was for this battell that Marius firſt inuented the new deuiſe he brought in for the darte which the ROMAINES were wonte alwaies to throwe againſt the enemies at the firſt charge. For before, the ſtaffe of the darte was faſtened vnto the iron, and the iron vnto the ſtaffe, with two litle iron pinnes that paſſed through the wood: and then Marius left one of the iron pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a litle thin pinne of wood, eaſie to be broken, in place of the ſame, making it craftely, to the end that when the dart was throwne, and ſtuck in the enemies target, it ſhould not ſtand right forward, but bowe downwards towards the iron, that the wooden pinne being broken, the ſtaffe of the darte ſhould hang downewards, holding yet by the iron pinne running quite through at the point. So Beorix king of the CIMBRES, comming neere to Marius campe with a ſmall number of horſemen, ſent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day & place for battell, that they might trie it out, who ſhould be owners of the country. Whereunto Marius made aunſwer, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to counſell with their enemies, of the time and place when they ſhould giue battell: but neuertheleſſe, he would not ſtick to pleaſure the CIMBRES ſo much. And thus they agreed betweene them, that it ſhould be the third day following, in the plaine of Verſelles, which was very commodious for the horſemen of the ROMAINES: and alſo for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conſull, had in his campe twenty thouſand, and three hundred ſouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thouſand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the battell, ſhutting in Catulus with his men in the middeſt. As Sylla writeth it, who was preſent at the ſame: ſaying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrow his enemies with the two wings of the battell, to the end that the whole victory should light vpon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the middest should haue no part therof. For he could not so much as fronte the enemy, becausе that commonly when the fronte of a battell is of such a breadth the two wings that euer stretched out before, and is made like the cressant of a moone, where the middest is thickest and fartherst in. And it is written also in other stories, that Catulus himselfe accusing the malice of Marius, becausе he did so: spake it to excusе his owne dishonour.

As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footemen comming out of their fortes leasurely did put themselues into a squadron, as broad as long, for in euery side they occupied almost thirty furlong: but their horsemen which were fifteene thousand, marched before in sumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heads fashioned like wilde beasts necks, and strange beuers or buffes to the same, and ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers as they had bene wings: which to sight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curasses on their backes, and caried great white targets before them: and for weapons offensiue, euery man had two darts in his hand to bestow a farre off, & when they came to hād strokes, they had great heauy swords, which they fought with all neere hand. But at that time they did not marche directly in rancke against the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMAINES betwen them and their footmen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines found their policie straight, but they could not keepe their souldiers backe: for there was one that cried the enemies fled, and immediatly all the rest began to runne after. In the meane time, the footmen of the barbarous people that were like to a sea before them, came forwards still: and then Marius hauing washed his hands, and lifting them vp to heauen, promised, and vowed a solemne sactifice vnto the gods of a hundred oxen. Catulus also made a vowe, lifting vp his hands to heauen in like maner, that he would build a temple vnto fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing sacrificed, when they shewed him the intrailes of the beast sacrificed: he cried out aloude, the victorie is mine. But when they came to giue the charge Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred vpon him by gods iustice, who turned his craft against himselfe, as Sylla writeth: for there rose very credibly so great a dust that both armies lost the sight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the first that ranne to begin the charge, and hauing placed his men about him, missed to meete with his enemies and being passed beyonde their battell, wandred a great while vp and downe the field, while the barbarous people fought against Catulus. So that the greatest fury of the battel was against Catulus and his army: in the which, Sylla writeth he was himselfe, and saieth, that the heate and the sun which was full in the CIMBRES faces, did the ROMAINES maruellous pleasure at that time. For the barbarous people being very hard, brought vp to away with colde (because they were borne and bred in a cold country, shadowed altogether with woods and (as we haue said) were to the contrary very tender against the heate, and did melt with sweate against the sunne, and gaped straight for breath, putting their targets before their faces: for it was also in the hart of summer, about the seauen and twentith day of the moneth of Iuly, that this battell was giuen, and this dust also made the ROMAINES the bolder, and kept them that they could not see the innumerable multitude of their enemies farre from them. And euery man running to set vpon them that came against them, they were ioyned together in fight before that the sight of their enemies could make them afraide. And furthermore, they were so good souldiers, and so able to take paines, that how extreame soeuer the heate was, no man was seene sweate nor blow, though they ran at the first to set vpon them: and this hath Lucretius himselfe left in writing vnto the praise of his souldiers. So were the most part of the barbarous people, & specially of the best souldiers, slaine in the field. And becausе they should not open nor breake their rancks, the formost rancks were all tied and bound together with girdles, leather thongs, and long chaines of iron: and they that fled, were chased and followed into their campe by the ROMAINES, where they met with horrible and fearefull things to beholde. For, their wiues being vpon the toppe of their cartes, apparelled all in blacke, slue those that fled, without regarde of persons: some their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren, and strangling the litle young babes with their owne hands, they cast them der the cart wheeles, and betweene the horſe legges, and afterwards ſlue them ſelues. And ey ſay, that there was a woman hanged at the end of a cart ladder, hauing hanged vp two her children by the necks at her heeles. And that the men alſo, for lacke of a tree to hang em ſelues on, tied ſlipping halters about their neckes, vnto the horns and feete of the oxen, d that they did pricke them afterwardes with goades to make them fling and leape ſo long, at dragging them all about, and treading them vnder feete, at the length they killed them. low, though numbers were ſlaine by this meanes, yet were there three ſcore thouſand of thē ken priſoners, and the number of them that were ſlaine, came to twiſe as many moe. In this anner Marius ſouldiers ſpoiled the campe of the CIMBRES: but the ſpoiles of dead men at were ſlaine in the field, with their enſignes and trumpettes, were all brought (as it is ſaid) nto Catulus campe, which was a plaine teſtimony to ſhew that Catulus and his ſouldiers had wonne the field. Strife riſing thus between the ſouldiers of both campes about it, that the mat- might be tried friendly betweene them: they made the Ambaſſadors of PARMA their ar- rators, who were by chāce at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius ſouldiers led the Am- aſſadors to the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, ſhewing them the enemies bodies earſed through with their pikes, which were eaſie to be knowen, becauſe Catulus had made em graue his name vpon their pikes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this reat victory, as well for the firſt battell he wanne alone, when he ouerthrew the TEVTONS nd the AMBRONS: as for his great calling, hauing beene Conſull fiue times. And further- ore, the common people at ROME, called him the third founder of the city of ROME, think- g themſelues now deliuered from as great a danger, as before time they had bene in from the ncient GAVLES. And euery man feaſting at home with his wife and children, offered the beſt ſhes of meat they had to ſupper, vnto the gods, and vnto Marius: and would needs haue him one to triumphe for both victories. But he would not in any caſe, but triumphed into the ci- y with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to ſhew him ſelfe curteous and moderate in ſo great proſ- erity: and peraduenture alſo fearing Catulus ſouldiers, who were in readineſſe and prepared f Marius would haue depriued their Captaine of that honor) to let him alſo of his triumph. nd thus you ſee how he paſſed his fifth Conſulſhippe. After that, he made more earneſt ſute or the ſixth Conſulſhip, then euer any other did for his firſt: ſeeking the peoples good willes y all the faire meanes he could to pleaſe them, humbling himſelfe vnto them, not onely more en became his eſtate and calling, but directly alſo againſt his owne nature, counterfeating a urteous populer manner, being cleane contrary to his diſpoſition. His ambition made him ureous to deale in matters of the ſtate concerning the city. For that courage and boldneſſe hich he had in battell againſt the enemy, he loſt it quite when he was in an aſſembly of peo- le in the city: and was eaſily put out of his biaſe, with the firſt blame or praiſe he heard giuen im. And though they report, that on a time when he mad a thouſand CAMERINES free f the city of ROME, becauſe they had done valiant ſeruice in the warres, that there were me that did accuſe him, ſaying, that it was a thing done againſt all law: he anſwered them, at for the noiſe of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithſtanding, it ſeemeth that deede he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an aſſembly of the city. For in time warres, he euer ſtood vpon his reputation and authority, knowing that they had neede him: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, becauſe he would rather be the chiefeſt man then honeſteſt man, he would creepe into the peoples boſomes to get their fauor and goodwil. nd thus through his euil behauiour, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies. t he feared not miſtruſted none ſo much, as hee did Metellus, for the great vnthankfull part e remembred he had playd him: and the rather alſo, becauſe he knew him to be a iuſt and true aling man, and one that was euer againſt theſe people-pleaſers and flatterers. Marius there- re practiſed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be baniſhed ROME. Wherefore, to cō- ſe his intent, he fell in friendſhip with Glaucia, and one Saturninus, two of the moſt boldeſt, moſt deſperate, and moſt harebraind young men that were in all ROME: who had all the ra- lement of rogues and beggers, and ſuch tumultuous people at their commaundement, by hoſe meanes he made new popular lawes, and cauſed the ſouldiers to be called home out of e wars, and mingled them with the people of the city in common aſſemblies, to trouble and vexe Metellus. Moreouer Rutilius, an honeſt and true writer, (howbeit an enemy vnto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his ſixth Conſulſhip by corruption of money, which he cauſed to be diſtributed amongſt the tribes of the people: and that he bought it for ready money to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaccus not for his fellow and companion in the Conſulſhippe, but rather for a miniſter of his will. There was neuer ROMAINE to whom the people graunted the Conſulſhippe ſixe times, except it were vnto Valerius Coruinus only. But for him they ſay that there was fiue and forty yeares betweene his firſt Conſulſhip and the laſt. Whereas Marius ſince the firſt yeare of his Conſulſhippe, continued fiue yeares together by good fortune one after an other. But in his laſt Conſulſhip, he wanne him ſelfe great hate and malice, becauſe he did many foule faults to pleaſe Saturninus withall: as amongeſt others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneſhip. Afterward when Saturninus was choſen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for diſtribution of the landes among the common people, and vnto that law he had ſpecially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate ſhould come openly to ſweare, that they ſhould keepe and obſerue from point to point that which the people by their voices ſhould decree, and ſhould not denie it in any iotte. But Marius in open Senate, made as though hee would withſtand this article, ſaying, that neither he nor any other wiſe man of iudgement would take this oth: for he, if the law be euill, then they ſhould doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to graunt it, and not of their owne good wils. But he ſpake not that, meaning to do as he did: for it was but a baite he had layed for Metellus only, which he could hardly eſcape. For, imagining that to tel a fine lie, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly reconciled with him ſelfe, not to paſſe for any thing he had ſpoken in the Senate. And to the contrary alſo, knowing well enough that Metellus was a graue wiſe man, who eſteemed that which is iuſt and true (as Pindarus ſaid) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought he would outreach him, making him affirme before the Senat that he would not ſweare, knowing alſo that the people would hate him deadly, if hee would refuſe afterwardes to ſweare. And ſo in deed it happened. For Metellus hauing aſſured them then that he would not ſweare, the Senate brake vp vppon it. And ſhortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senate vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to ſweare before the people: Marius went further to offer him ſelfe to ſweare. Whereupon the people making ſilence, liſtned attentiuely to heare what he would ſay. But Marius not regarding his large promiſe and brags made before the Senate, ſayed then, his necke was not ſo long that he would preiudice the common wealth in a matter of ſo great importance: but that he would ſweare, and obey the law, if it were a law. This ſhifting ſubtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his ſhame: and when he had ſayd ſo, he tooke his oth. The people ſeeing him ſweare, were maruellous glad, and praiſed him with clapping of their handes: but the nobility hanging downe their heads were diſcontented of him, and were maruellous angry in their hearts with him, that he had ſo cowardly and ſhamefully gone from his word. Thereupon all the Senate tooke their othes, one after another againſt their wils, becauſe they were afrayed of the people. Sauing Metellus, whom neither parents nor friendes perſwaſion and intreaty could once moue to ſweare, for any puniſhment that Saturninus had impoſed vpon them, which refuſed to take the othe, but continued a man ſtill according to his nature, and would neuer yeelde vnto it, offering to abide any puniſhment rather then to be brought to conſent to a diſhoneſt matter vnbeſeeming his eſtate. And therevpon went out of the aſſembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them that to do euill it was too eaſie a thing: and to doe good without daunger, it was alſo a common matter: but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honeſt and vertuous man. Saturninus then commaunded the Conſuls by edict of the people, that they ſhould baniſh Metellus by ſound of trumpet, with ſpeciall commaundement, that no man ſhould receiue him, haue fire nor water, nor lodge him priuatly nor openly. The common people, they were ready to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the iniury they had offred him, gathered together about him to ſaue him, if any would offer violence. Metellus him ſelfe was ſo good a man, that he would not any ciuill diſſention ſhould riſe for his ſake: and therefore he abſented him ſelfe from ROME, wherein he did like a man. For ſayd he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting them ſelues of the wrong they haue done me, will call me home againe: or elſe things ſtanding as they do now, it ſhall be beſt for me to be furtheſt off. But for his trauaile in his exile, how much he was beloued and honoured, and how ſweetely he paſſed his time ſtudying philoſophy in the city of RHODES, ſhall be declared more at large in his life. Now on the other ſide, Marius to recompence the pleaſure Saturninus had done him, being driuen to let him haue his will in all things did not foreſee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the common wealth, giuing the bridle to a deſperate man, who euery way, by force, by ſword and murder, plainely ſought to vſurpe tyrannicall power, with the vtter deſtruction and ſubuerſion of the whole common wealth. And ſo bearing reuerence on the one ſide vnto the nobility, and deſiring on the other ſide to gratifie the common people: he plaied a ſhamefull part, and ſhewed him ſelfe a double dealing man. For one night the nobility and chiefeſt citizens comming to his houſe, to perſwade him to bridle Saturninus inſolency and boldnes: at the ſelfe ſame time alſo Saturninus going thither to ſpeake with him, he cauſed him to be let in at a backe dore, the noble men not being priuy to his comming. And ſo Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus that he was troubled with a loſenes of his body, vnder this pretence whipped vp & down, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing elſe but ſet them further out one againſt an other, then they were before. Neuertheles, the Senat being maruellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knightes taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to ſuppreſſe them that were vppe, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yeelde them ſelues at the length, becauſe he had cut off the pipes and conduits by the which the water ranne into the Capitol. By reaſon whereof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Marius vnto them, and yeelded them ſelues to him, vnder the aſſuraunce of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could poſsible to his vttermoſt power to ſaue them, he could not preuaile, nor doe them pleaſure: for they were no ſooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he hauing now purchaſed him ſelfe the ill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Cenſors ſhould be choſen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the ſuters: howbeit he ſued not for it, for feare of repulſe, but ſuffered others to be choſen of farre leſſe dignity and calling then himſelfe. Wherein notwithſtanding he gloried, ſaying that he would not ſue to be Cenſor, becauſe he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too ſtraightly their liues and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus baniſhment, Marius did what he could poſsible by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, ſeeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus baniſhment, Marius heart would not ſerue him to ſee Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: therefore he tooke the ſeas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, vnder colour to pay certaine ſacrifices to the mother of the gods, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cauſe that made him to vndertake this iourney, for he had an other ſecret meaning in him. For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuil matters, and hauing attained to his greatnes by armes, and ſuppoſing that his glory and authority conſumed and decaſed altogether liuing idlely in peace: he ſought to deuiſe new occaſion of warres; hoping that he could ſtirre vp the kinges of ASIA, and ſpecially Mithridates (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make warres againſt the ROMAINES) that he could then vndoubtedly without let of any man be choſen Generall to make wars with him, and withall alſo, that by that meanes he ſhould haue occaſion to fill the city of ROME with new triumphs, and his houſe with the ſpoiles of the great kingdome of PONTE, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates diſpoſing him ſelfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor & curteſies he could poſsibly ſhew him: Marius in the end notwithſtāding would not once giue him a good looke, nor a curteous word again, but churliſhly ſayd vnto Mithridates at his departure from him. Thou muſt determine one of theſe two, king Mithridates: either to make thy ſelfe ſtronger then the ROMAINES, or elſe to looke to doe what they command thee, without reſiſtance. Theſe wordes amaſed Mithridates, who had heard ſay before that the ROMAINES would speake their minds freely: howbeit he neuer saw nor proued it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto ROME, he built a house neare vnto the market place, because he would not (as he said him self) that such as came vnto him should trouble them selues in going farre to bring him home to his house: or else for that he thought this would be an occasion that diuerse would come to salute him, as they did other Senators. Howbeit that was not the cause in deede, but the only cause was, for that hee had no naturall grace nor ciuility to entertaine men curteously that came vnto him, and that he lacked learning and eloquence besides to rule in a common wealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him, then they did of an old rusty harnesse or implement that was good for nothing, but for the warres only. And for all other that professed armes as him selfe did, nothing grieued him so much to be called forward to office and state before him selfe, as Sylla did. Insomuch he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the noble men did all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes first rising and preferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES people: he offred vp statues of victories, carying tokens of triumph, into the temple of the Capitoll, and placed neare vnto them also, an image of gold of king Iugurthe, which he deliuered by his own hands vnto Sylla. And this made Marius starke madde for spite and iealousie, and could not abide that an other should take vppon him the glory of his doings: insomuch as he determined to plucke those images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other side stomached Marius, and would not suffer him to take thē out of the place where they were: so that this ciuill sedition had taken present effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betweene, and restrained them for a time. For the best souldiers and most warlike people of all ITALIE, and of greatest power, they all together rose against the ROMAINES, and had wellneare ouerthrowen their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force, and power, and well armed: but their Captaines also, for valantnes and skill, did in manner equall the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this war fell out wonderfully, by reason of the cruelty and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as did Marius shame and dishonor. For he shewed him selfe very could and slow in all his enterprises, still delaying time, eyther because age had mortified his actiue heate, and killed the quick ready disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue three score and fiue yeare olde: or else as he sayd him selfe, because he was waxen gouty, and had ache in his vaines and sinewes, that he could not well stir his body, and that for shame, because he would not tary behinde in this warre, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithstanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were slaine sixe thousand of their enemies: and so long as the warres endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but patiently suffered them sometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and giue him vile wordes, and challenging him out to fight, and yet all this would not prouoke him. It is said also, that Pompeius Silo, who was the chiefest Captaine of reputation & authority the enemies had, said vnto Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, so great a Captaine as they say thou art, leaue thy camp, and come out to battell. Nay, said Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the eares, and compell mee to come to battell. An other time when the enemies gaue them occasion to giue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were so fainthearted and durst not set vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were ashamed, Marius caused his men to assemble, and spake vnto them in this sort. I cannot tell which of the two I should recken most cowards: you your selues, or your enemies: for they dare not once see your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was constrained to resigne his charge, being able to serue no longer for the weakenesse and debilitie of his body. Now, all the rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at ROME (by the orators meanes) did sue to haue the charge of the warres against Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and rash man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perswaded them to giue him the charge of these wars, with title and authority of vice Consull. The people thereupon were deuided in two partes: for the one goode for Marius, and the other would haue Sylla take the charge, saying, that Marius was to thinke now vpon the hote bathes at Baies, to looke to cure his old body, brought lowe with new me and age, as him selfe sayd. For Marius had a goodly stately house in those partes neare vnto the mount of Misene, which was farre more fine and curiously furnished, then became a Captaine that had beene in so many foughten battels and dangers. They say that Crassus afterwardes bought that fine house for the summe of seuen thousand fiue hundred crownes, and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thousand crownes; so so great excesse was vanity and curiosity growen in very short time at ROME. Notwithstanding all this, Marius too ambitiously striuing like a passioned yong man against the weakenes and debility of his age, neuer missed day but he would be in the field of Mars, to exercise him selfe among the young men, shewing his body disposed and ready to handle all kinde of weapons, and to ride horses: albeit that in his later time, he had no great health of body, because he was very heauy and fat. There were that liked that passing well in him, and went of purpose into the field to see what paines he tooke, striuing to excell the rest. Howbeit those of the better sort were very sory to see his auarice and ambition, considering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane person a great estate, that he could not now containe his prosperity within reasonable boundes, nor content him selfe to be esteemed and honoured, quietly enioying all he had wonne, and which at that present he did possesse: but as if he had beene very poore and needy, after he had received such great honor and triumphes, would yet carry out his age so stoutly, euen into CAPPADOCIA, and vnto the realme of PONT, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieutenants of king Mithridates. In deede he alleaged some reasons to excuse him selfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he sayd that he desired in person to bring vp his sonne in exercise of armes, and to teach him the discipline of warres. That discouered the secret hidden plague, which of long time hath lurked in ROME, Marius specially hauing now met with a fit instrument, and minister to destroy the common wealth, which was, the insolent and rash Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, sauing that he was found too cowardly and faint hearted in all his enterprises, and for that did Marius iustly reproue him. But Sulpitius, because he would not dally nor delay time, had euer sixe hundred young gentlemen of the order of knights, whom he vsed as his gard about him, and called them the gard against the Senate. And one day as the Consuls kept their common assembly in the market place, Sulpitius coming in armed vpon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Consuls sonnes being taken tardy, was slaine. Sylla being the other Consull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius house, ranne into the same against the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ranne after him not being aware, passed by the house. And it is reported that Marius him selfe conuayed Sylla safely out at a backe dore, and that he being scaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithstanding, Sylla him selfe in his commentaries doth not say, that he was saued in Marius house when he fled: but that he was brought thither to giue his consent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would haue forced him vnto against his will, presenting him naked swordes on euery side. And he writeth also, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius house, he was kept there in this feare, vntill such time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornement of iustice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the commission and charge of this war against Mithridates to be assigned vnto Marius by the voice of the people. Therfore Marius giuing order for his departure, sent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing won his souldiers hearts before, and stirred them vp against Marius, brought them on with them directly towardes ROME, being no lesse then fiue and thirty thousand fighting men: who meeting vpon the Captaines Marius had sent vnto them, slew them in the field. In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in ROME put many of Syllaes friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by sound of trumpet, to all slaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered them selues. Whereupon, hauing made a litle resistaunce vnto Sylla when he came into ROME, he was soone after compelled to runne his way. Marius was no sooner out of the city, but they that were in his company forsaking him, dispersed them selues here and there being darke night: and Marius himself got to a house of his in the countrey, called Salonium, and sent his sonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes not farre from thence, to make some prouision for victuals. But Marius the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared for him a shippe, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarying for his sonne, and hoyted vp sayle, hauing onely Granius his wiues sonne with him. In the meane time the younger Marius staying at his father in law Mutius farme, staied so long in getting of prouision, in trussing of it vp, and carying it away, that broad day light had like to haue discouered him: for the enemies had aduertisement whither he was gone, whereupon certaine horsemen were sent thither speedily to haue found him: But the keeper of the house hauing an inckling of their comming, and preuenting them also before they came, sodainely yoked his oxen to the cart which he loaded with beanes, and hidde his younger Marius vnder the same. And pricking the oxen forward with his goade, set out, and met them as he went towards the city, and deliuered Marius in this sort into his wiues house: and there taking such thinges as hee needed, when night following came, went towardes the sea, and tooke ship, finding one crosse sailed by.

towards Africke. Marius the father saying on still, had a very good winde to passe longest the coast of Italy: notwithstanding, being afrayed of one Geminius, a chiefe man of Terracine, who hated him to the death, he gaue the mariners warning thereof before and willed them to take heede of landing at Terracine. The mariners were very willing to obey him, but the winde stoode full against them comming from the maine, which raised great storme, and they feared much that their vessell which was but a bote, would not beare the seas, besides that he him selfe was very sicke in his stomacke, and sore sea beaten: notwithstanding, at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recouered the coast against the city of Circees. In the meane time, the storme increased still, and their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp and down not knowing what to doe, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in such cases of extremity, they thought it alwaies the best safety for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they saw not: for if the sea were their enemy, the land was so likewise. To meete with men, they were afrayed: and not to meete with them on the other side lacking victuals, was in deede the greater danger. Neuerthelesse, in the end they met with heard men that could giue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as soone as hee could possible, because it was not long since there passed by a great troupe of horsemen that sought him al about. And thus being brought vnto such perplexity, that he knew not where to bestow him selfe, and specially for his poore men he had in his company were almost starued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and sought out a very thicke wodde where he passed all that night in sorrow, and the next morning being compelled by necessity, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandered on alongest the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, and praying them not to despaire, but to commit them selues to him, euen vntill the last hope, trusting in certaine prophecies which the Southsayers had told him of long time before. For when hee was but very young, and dwelling in the countrey, he gathered vp in the lap of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were seuen young Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondering, asked the Southsayers what that ment. They answered, that their sonne one day should be one of the greatest men in the world, and that out of doubt hee should obtaine seuen times in his life the chiefest office and dignity in his country. And for that matter, it is sayed that so in deede it came to passe. Others holde opinion, that such as were about Marius at that time, in that present place, and elsewhere, during the time of his flying, they hearing him tell this tale, beleeued it, and afterwards put it downe in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both false and fayned. For they say, that the Eagle neuer getteth but two young ones: by reason whereof it is manifest fayned also, that the Poet Musæus hath lyed: in that which hee hath written in these verses.

Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying said, that he was assured he should come vnto the seuenth Consulship. When they were come neere vnto the citie of MINTVRNES, about a two mile and a halfe from it, they might perceiue a troupe of horsemen comming by the sea side, and two shippes on the sea that fell vppon the coast by good happe. Wherefore they all beganne to runne (so long as they had breath and strength) towardes the sea, into the which they threwe themselues, and got by swimming vnto one of the shippes where Granius was: and they crossed ouer vnto the Ile that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauie and sicke of bodie, two of his seruants holpe to holde him vp alwaies aboue water, with the greatest paine and difficultie in the worlde: and at the last they laboured so throughly, that they put him into the other shippe the selfe same present, when the horsemen came vnto the sea side, who cried out aloude to the mariners to land againe, or else throwe Marius ouer borde, and then to goe where they would. Marius on the other side humbly besought them with teares, not so to doe: whereby the masters of the ship in a short space were in many mindes whether to doe it, or not to doe it. In the ende notwithstanding, they answered the horsemen they would not throwe him ouer borde: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But as soone as they were gone, the masters of the shippe changing minde, drewe towardes lande, and cast ancker about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her banckes, and maketh great marisses: & there they tolde Marius he should do well to goe a land to eate somewhat, and refresh his sea sicke bodie, till the winde serued them to make saile, which doubtlesse saide they, will be at a certaine houre when the sea winde falles and becomes calme, and that there riseth a tide winde from the lande, ingendred by the vapours of the marisses, which will serue the turne very well to the seas againe. Marius following their counsell, and thinking they had meant good faith, was set a lande vpon the riuers bancke: and there laide him downe vpon the grasse, nothing suspecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners presently taking their shippe againe, and hoysing vp their anckers sailed straight away, and fled: iudging it no honestie for them to haue deliuered Marius into the handes of his enemies; nor safetie for themselues to haue saued him. Marius finding himselfe all alone, & forsaken of euery man, lay on the ground a great while, and said neuer a word: yet at the length taking heart a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandred vp and downe, where was neither way nor path at all, ouerthwart deepe marisses and great ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore olde mans cotage, dwelling there in those marisses, and falling at his feete, besought him to helpe to saue and succour a poore afflicted man, with promise that one day he would giue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present danger wherein he was. The olde man whether for that he had knowen Marius afore time, or that seeing him (by coniecture only) iudged him to be some great personage, told him that he ment but to lie downe and rest himselfe a litle, his poore cabine would serue that turne reasonably well: but if he mente to wander thus, to fly his enemies that followed him, he would rather bring him into a more secret place, and farther off from noise. Marius praied him that he would do so much for him: and the good man brought him into the marish, vnto a lowe place by the riuers side, where he made him lie downe, and then couered him with a great pile of reede and bent, and other such light things as could not hurt him. He had not long lien there, but he heard a great noyse comming towardes the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of TERRACINE had sent men all about to seeke for him, whereof some by chance came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatned him that he had receiued and hidden an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing that, rose out of the place where the old man had hide him, and stripping himselfe starke naked, went into a part of the marish where the water was full of myre and mudde, and there was founde of those that searched for him: who taking him out of the slime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of MINTVRNES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALIE, that they should apprehend Marius, and kill him where-soeuer they found him. Notwithstanding, the gouernours and magistrates of MINTVRNE thought good first to consult thereupon amongest themselues, & in the meane time they de uered him into the safe custody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bee a bitter enemie of his, for an old grudge she had to him, which was this. Fannia sometime ha a husband called Tinnius, whom she was willing to leaue for that they could not agree, and re quited her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe saide, she ha plaide the whore. The matter was brought before Marius in his sixth Consulship, who ha giuen iudgement vpon it. Both parties being heard, and the law prosecuted on either side, it was found that this Fannia was a naughtie woman of her bodie, & that her husband knew it well enough before he maried her, yet tooke her with her faultes, and long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gaue sentence that the husband should repay backe her dower, and that for her naughtie life, she should pay foure farthings. This notwithstanding, when Fannia saw Marius, she grudged him not for that, and least of all had any reuenging minde in her towardes him; but contrarily did comfort and helpe him what she could with that she had. Marius thanked her maruellously for it, & bad her hope well: because he met with good lucke as he was comming to her house, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neere to Fanniaes house, her dore being open, there came a asse running out to go drinke at a conduit not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked vpon him with a liuely ioyfull countenance, first of all stopping sodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skippe by him. Whereupon Marius straight coniecturing with himselfe, said, that the goddes did signifie vnto him that he should saue himselfe sooner by water then by lande: because that the asse leauing him, came to drinke and cared not to eate. So when he had tolde Fannia this tale, he desired to rest, and praied them to let him alone, and to shut the chamber dore to him. But the magistrates of the citie hauing consulted together about him, in the ende resolued they must determine no longer time, but dispatch him out of the way presently. Now when they were agreed vpon it, they could not finde a man in the citie that durst take vpon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAVLES; or one of the CIMBRES (for we finde both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his sword drawen in his hand. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he saw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner saying vnto him: O fellowe, thou, dareste thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing these wordes, ranne out of the chamber presently, casting his sword in the middest of the flower, and crying out these wordes onely: I can not kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTVRNIANS afraide in the citie at the first, but afterwards it moued them to compassion. So they were angry with themselues, and did repent them that they conuented the counsell to so cruell and vnkinde a deede, against one that had preserued all ITALIE: and denie him aide in so extreame necessitie, it was too great a sinne. Therefore let vs let him go, saide they to themselues, where he will, and suffer him take his fortune appointed him where: and let vs pray to the goddes to pardon this offence of ours, to haue thrust Marius naked & beggerly out of our citie. For these considerations, the MINTVRNIANS went all together to Marius where he was, and stoode about him, determining to see him safely conducted vnto the sea side. Now though euery man was readie and willing to pleasure him, some with one thing, some with an other, and that they did hasten him all they could possible, yet they were a good while a going thither: because there was a wodde called Matica, that lay right in their way betwene their city & the sea coast which they greatly reuerence, and thinke it a scriledge to carie any thing out of that wodde, that was once brought into it. On the other side, to leaue to goe through this wodde, and to compasse it rounde about, it would aske a maruellous long time. So they standing all in doubt what they should doe, one of the auncientest men of the citie spake a loud vnto them, and said: that there was no way forbidden them that went about to saue Marius life. Then Marius himselfe being the formost man, tooke vp some of the fardels which they caried with him, to pleasure him in the ship, went through the wodde. All other things necessary being thus readily prepared for him with like goodwill and specially the shippe which one Bellæus had ordained for him: he caused all this storie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke shippe. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune caried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he found Granius and some other of his friendes, with whom he tooke sea againe, and pointed towardes AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to land in SICILIA, in the territorie of the citie of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMAINE Quæstor, who kept that coast. Marius being landed there, scaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he slew sixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all speede, crossed the seas, vntill he arriued in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he first vnderstood that his sonne was saued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempsall king of the NVMIDIANS to beseech him of aide. This gaue him a litle courage, & made him bold to passe out of that Ile, into the coast of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernour of AFRICKE, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pity onely he might perhaps haue helpe at his hand. Howbeit he was no sooner landed with a fewe of his men, but a sergeant came straight and said vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernour of LIBYA, doth forbid thee to land in all this prouince: otherwise he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandement, and pursue thee as an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing this commaundement, was so angrie and sorie both, that he could not readily tell what answere to make him, and paused a good while, and said neuer a word, still eying the sergeant with a grimme looke: vntill he asked him what answere he would make to the Prætors commandement. Marius then fetching a deepe sigh from his heart, gaue him this answere. Thou shalt tell Sextilius, that thou hast seene Caius Marius banished out of his country, sitting amongest the ruines of the citie of CARTHAGE. By this answere, he wisely laide the example of the ruine and destruction of that great citie of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune: to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vppon him. In the meane time, Hiempsall king of the NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to resolue, did honorably intreat young Marius and his companie. But when they were willing to goe their way, he alwaies found new occasion to stay them, and was very glad to see that he started not for any opportunitie or good occasion that was offered: notwithstanding, there fortuned a happie meane vnto them, whereby they saued themselues. And this it was. This Marius the younger being a faire complexioned young man, it pitied one of the kings concubines to see him so hardly dealt withal. This pitie of hers was a shadow to cloke the loue she bare him: but Marius would not hearken at the first to her intisementes, and refused her. Yet in the ende, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and considering that she did all things for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then she would haue done, if she had not ment further matter vnto him, then onely to enioy the pleasure of him: he then accepted her loue and kindnesse, so as at the length shee taught him a way howe to flie, and saue himselfe and his friendes. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had imbraced and saluted eech other, going alongst the sea side, they found two scorpions fighting together. Marius tooke this for an ill signe: whereupon they quickly tooke a fisher boat, & went into the Ile of CERCINA, which is no great distance off from firme lande. They had no sooner hoised vp anker, but they saw the horsemen which king Hiempsall had sent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greatest dangers that Marius euer escaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Sylla made warre against king Mithridates Lieutenants: and furthermore, that the Consuls being vp in armes the one against the other, Octauius hadde the battell, and being the stronger, had driuen out Cinna who fought to haue vsurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Consull in his place: and that Cinna on the other side leauied men out of other partes of ITALIE, and made warres vpon them that were at ROME. Marius hearing of this dissention, thought good to returne as soone as he could possible into ITALIE. And assembling certaine horsemen of the nation of the MAVRVSIANS in AFRICKE, and certaine ITALIANS that had saued themselues there, vnto the number of a thousand men in all: he tooke sea, and landed in a hauen of THVSCANE called TELAMON, and being landed, proclaimed by ſound of trompet, libertie to all ſlaues and bondmen that would come to him. So the labourers, heardmen and neateheardes of all that march, for the onely name and reputation of Marius, ranne to the ſea ſide from all partes: of the which he hauing choſen out the ſtouteſt and luſtieſt of them, wanne them ſo by faire wordes, that hauing gathered a great companie together in fewe daies, he made fortie ſaile of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octauius was a maruellous honeſt man, that would haue no authoritie otherwiſe then law and reaſon would: and that Cinna to the contrarie was ſuſpected of Sylla, that he ſought to bring in change and innouation to the common wealth, he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius ſent firſt vnto Cinna, to let him vnderſtande that he would obey him as Conſull, and be readie to doe all that he ſhould commaund him. Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconſull, and ſent him ſergeants carie axes and roddes before him, with all other ſignes of publicke authoritie. But Marius refuſed them, and ſaide, that pompe became not his miſerable fortune: for hee euer wente in poore threede-bare gowne, and had let his haire grow ſtill after he was baniſhed, being aboue threeſcore and tenne yeares olde, and had a ſober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that ſaw him. But vnder all this counterfaite pitie of his, he neuer changed his natural looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible then otherwiſe. And where he ſpake but litle, and went very demurely and ſoberly, that ſhewed rather a cankered courage within him then a mind humbled by his baniſhment. Thus when he had ſaluted Cinna, and ſpoken to the ſouldiers: he then beganne to ſet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in few daies. For firſt of all, with his ſhips he cut off all the victuals by ſea, and robbed the marchants that caried corne and other victuals to ROME: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace he was maſter purueyor for all neceſſarie prouiſion and victuals. After this he went alongſt the coaſt, and tooke all the cities vpon the ſea ſide, and at the length wanne OSTIA alſo by treaſon, put the moſt part of them in the towne to the ſword, and ſpoyled all their goods: and afterwards making a bridge vpon the riuer of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any manner of prouiſion by ſea. That done, he went directly towards ROME with his armie, where firſt he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octauius fault: who ouerthrewe himſelfe in his doinges, not much for lacke of reaſonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curioſitie and fineſſe in obſeruing the law. For when diuerſe did perſwade him to ſet the bondmen at liberty, and take armes for defence of the common wealth: he anſwered, that he would neuer giue men the law and priuiledge of a ROMAINE citizen, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of Rome to maintaine the authoritie of the law. But when Cæcilius Metellus was come to Rome, ſonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begunne the warres in LIBYA againſt Iugurthe, was put out by Marius: the ſouldiers forſooke Octauius immediatly, and came to him, becauſe they tooke him to be a better Captaine, and deſired alſo to haue a leader that could tell how to commaund them to ſaue the citie, and the common wealth. For they preſſed to fight valiantly, and perſwaded themſelues that they ſhould ouercome their enemies, that they had a skilfull and valiant Captaine that could order them. Metellus miſliking their offer, commanded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Conſull: but they for ſpight went vnto their enemies. Metellus on the other ſide, ſeeing no good order taken in the citie to reſiſt the enemies, got him out of ROME. But Octauius being perſwaded by certaine Scothſaiers and CHALDEAN ſacrificers, who promiſed him all ſhould goe well with him, tarried ſtill in ROME. For that man being otherwiſe, as wiſe as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that liued as vprightly in his Conſulſhippe, not caried away with flattering tales, and one alſo that followed the auncient orders and cuſtomes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any part therof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Scothſaiers, wiſemen, and aſtronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and gouernment. Wherefore, before that Marius himſelfe came into the citie, Octauius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for orations, and ſlaine preſently by Marius ſouldiers, whom he had ſent before into the citie. And it is ſaid alſo, that when he was ſlaine, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecie in his boſome: and here is to be noted a great contrarietie in theſe two notable men, Octauius and Marius. The firſt loſt his life by truſting to ſoothſaying, and the other prospered, & rose againe, because he did not despise the arte of diuination. The state of ROME standing then in this manner, the Senate consulting together, sent Ambassadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into ROME, and not to embrue their hands with the bloud of their citizens. Cinna sitting in his chaire as Consull, gaue them audience, & made them a very reasonable and courteous answere. Marius standing by him spake neuer a word: but shewed by his sower looke that he would straight fill ROME with murder and bloud. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into ROME enuironned with a great number of souldiers: but Marius staied sodainely at the gate, speaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a banished man, and driuen out of his country by law. And therefore if they would haue him come into ROME againe, they should first by a contrary decree abolish and reuoke that of his banishment, as if he had bene a religious obseruer of the lawes, and as though ROME had at that present enioyed their freedome and libertie. Thus he made the people assemble in the market place to proceede to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to giue their voices, disguising the matter no longer, and shewing plainely that he ment not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into ROME with a guard about him, of the veriest rascals, & most shameless slaues, called the BARDIOEIANS, who came to him from all parts: and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nodde of his head made to them, slew many men through his commaundement, and at the length slew Antharius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feete with their swordes, because only that Marius did not salute him when he came one day to speake with him. After this murther, they continued killing all them that Marius did not salute, and speake vnto: for that was the verie signe he had giuen them, to kill them openly in the streetes before euery man, so that his very friendes were afeard of being murthered, when they came to salute him. Thus being a great number of men slaine, Cinna in the end beganne to be satisfied, and to appease his anger. But Marius anger and vnsatiable desire of reuenge increased more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him neuer so litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skoutes & spies to hunt them out that hid themselues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friende is faithfull, nor to be trusted, if fortune especially frowne neuer so litle: for there were very fewe that did not betray their friendes that fled to them for succour. And therefore doe Cornutus seruants so much the more deserue praise, who hauing secretly hidden their master in his house, did hang the dead body of some common person by the necke, and hauing put a golde ring on his finger, they shewed him to the BARDIOEIANS, Marius guard, and buried him in steede of their owne master, without suspition of any man that it was a fained thing: and so Cornutus being hidden by his seruants, was safely conueyed into the country of GAVLE. Marke Antony the Orator had also found out a faithfull friende, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithfull friend of his, was a poore simple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefest men of ROME into his house to keepe him close there: he being desirous to make him the best chere he could with that litle he had, sent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, and tasting the wine more curiously then he was wont to do, he called for better. The drawer asked him why the new ordinarie wine would not serue him, but he must needes haue of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply answered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his master did hide Marke Anthony, who was hidden very secretly in his house. He was no sooner gone with his wine, & his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was set to supper whē he came. The drawer being brought vnto him, promised him to deliuer Marke Antonie into his handes. Marius hearing that, was so iocond, that he cried out and clapt his handes together for ioy: and would haue risen from the borde, and gone thither himselfe in person; had not his friendes kept him backe. But he sent Annius one of his Captaines thither with a certaine number of souldiers, and commaunded them to bring him his heade quickely. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the dore, and the souldiers went vp the staiers into the chamber, and finding Anthony there, they beganne to encourage one an other to kill him, for not one of them hauing the heart to lay handes vppon him. For Anthonies tongue was as sweete as a Syrene, and had such an excellent grace in speaking, that when he began to speake vnto the souldiers, and to pray them to saue his life: there was not one of them so hard harted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiuing they taried long, and came not downe, went himselfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthonie talking to his souldiers, and them weeping, his sweete eloquent tongue had so melted their heartes: but rating them, ranne furiously vpon him, and strake off his head with his owne handes. And Catulus Luctatius also, that had bene Consull with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBRES with him, seeing himselfe in this perill, set men to intreat Marius for him: but his answere was euer, he must needes die. So Catulus locked himselfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the smoke thereof choked himselfe. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the streetes, and trodde them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitifull, but a fearefull sight to all that sawe them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that gricued the people so much, as the horrible leachery and abhominable cruelties of this guard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houses by force, after they had slaine the masters, defiled their young children, and rauished their wiues and maides, and no man would once reproue their cruelties, leacherie, and vnsatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sotorius in the end set vpon them as they slept in their campe, and slew them euery one. this extremitie, as if all things had bene restored vnto their first estate, newes came again from all parts to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre against king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vsurped: returned into ITALY with a great power. This caused these euils and vnspeakeable miseries to cease a litle, because the wicked doers of the same, looked they should haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was chosen Consull the seuenth time. He going out of his house openly the first day of Ianarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take possession of his Consulshippe: caused one Sextius Lucinus to be throwen downe headlong from the rock Tarpeian, which seemed to be a great signe and certaine token of the euils and miseries, that fell out afterwardes the selfe same yeare vpon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie beside. But Marius being sore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppressed with extreame sorow and griefe, could not now at this last time of neede plucke vp his heart to him againe, when he came to thinke of the new toward warre that threatned him, and of the dangers, griefes, and troubles he should enter into, more great and perilous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he beganne to thinke of it, considering that he had to fight, not with Octauius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a companie of rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and now came now from driuing the puisant king Mithridates, vnto the furthest part of the realme of PONT, and of the sea Euxinum. Thus, deepely waighing and considering the same, and specially when he looked backe vpon his long time of banishment, how vacabondlike he wandered vp and downe in other countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had passed, and the sundry dangers he fell so often into, being pursued still by sea and by lande: it grieued him to the heart, and made him so vnquiet, that hee could not sleepe in the night, or if he slept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and still he thought he heard a voice burring in his eares.

that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increase of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extreamely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly also for the ouer heauie burden of his present ill, there needed but litle more aggrauation to fall into the disease whereof he died, which was a pleurisie: as Posidonius the Philosopher writeth, who saith plainely that he went into his chamber when he was sicke, and spake no him about matters of his Ambaſſade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet an other hiſtoriographer Caius Piſo writeth, that Marius walking one day after ſupper with his friendes, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and againſt him: concluding, that it is no wiſe mans part to truſt her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and layed him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ſicke ſeuen dayes together, and on the ſeuenth day dyed. Some write that his ambition appeared plainly, by a ſtrange raging that tooke him in his head during his ſickneſſe. For he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, & ſhewed in his bed all his geſtures and mouings of his body, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the ſelfe ſame cryes out aloud, which he was wont to crie whē he was in the extremeſt fight. The deſire he had to haue take this charge in hand againſt Mithridates, was ſo deepely ſetled in his minde through extreme ambition & drouſie that poſſeſt him: that being then three ſcore and ten yeare old, after he had bene the firſt man that euer was choſen ſeuen times Conſull in ROME, and alſo after that he had gotten world of goods and richeſſe together that might haue ſufficed many kings: yet for all this he dyed for ſorrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had deſired. But this was cleane contrary vnto that the wiſe Plato did, when he drew neare to his death. For he gaue God thankes for his fatall end & good fortune. Firſt, for that he had made him a reaſonable man, and no brute beaſt: ſecondly, a Greeke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported alſo, that one Antipater of THARSIS, calling to minde a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy nauigation he made, comming from his country vnto ATHENS: which did witneſſe that he put vp in the ſyle of his good accounts for a ſingular great grace, all fauour fortune had ſhewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memorie, being the only and moſt aſſured treaſure a man can haue, to keepe thoſe giftes that nature or fortune do beſtow vpon him. But contrariwiſe vnthankefull fooles vnto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefites, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwayes voyde of goodes and full of hope, gaping ſtill for things to come and leauing in the meane time the things preſent, though reaſon perſwades them the contrary. For fortune may eaſily let them haue the thing to come, but ſhe can not take that from them which is already paſt: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto them, and become alwayes of that which is vncertaine. And ſure it chaunceth to them by great reaſon. For, hauing gathered outward goods together, and locking them vp before they haue built & layd a ſure grounded foundation of reaſon through good learning: they can not afterwards fill or quench their vnſatiable greedy couetous minde. Thus ended Marius his life, the ſeuenth day of his ſeuenth Conſulſhip, whereof all the citie of ROME was not a litle glad, and tooke hart againe vnto them, ſuppoſing they had then bene deliuered from a bloudy cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their coſt, that they had changed an old maiſter taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: ſuch extreme vnnaturall cruelties, & murthers did Marius the younger cōmit, after the death of his father Marius, murthering in manner all the chiefeſt noble men of ROME. At the firſt, they tooke him for a valiant and hardy young man, whereupon they named him the ſonne of Mars: but ſhortly after his deedes did ſhew the contrary, and then they called him the ſonne of Venus. In the end he was ſhut in, and beſieged by Sylla in the citie of PERVSIA, where he did what he could poſsible to ſaue his life, but all was in vaine: and laſtly, ſeeing no way to eſcape, the citie being taken, he ſlue himſelfe with his owne handes.

THE LIFE OF Lyſander.

IN the treaſurie of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inſcription: Braſidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the ſpoyle of the ATHENIANS. creded of the LACONICALL discipline and education he had, and not so much of his owne nature. But indeede of his owne nature he was a right courtier, & could tell how to entertaine and flatter great states & nobility, farre better then the common manner of the naturall SPARTANS: & moreouer for his priuate benefit, he could easily beare with the stoutnesse of greater men of authority then himselfe, which some iudge to be a great point of wisedome, to know how to deale in matters of state. Aristotle in a place where he sayth, that the greatest wits commonly are subiect vnto melancholie, (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lysander in his later age fell into the melancholie disease, but not in his youth. He had also this singular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwayes kept that honest modestly with him, as he would neuer be ouercome nor corrupted with gold nor siluer: and yet he filled his country with riches and couetousnesse, which lost him the reputation he had wonne, because himselfe made none account of riches nor getting. For bringing store of gold & siluer into his country after he had ouercome the ATHENIANS, he reserued not vnto himselfe one Drachma onely. And furthermore, whē Dyonisius the tyrāt of SYRACVSA had on a time sent goodly rich gownes out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refused them, saying, that he was afrayed such gownes would make them fowler. Neuertheless, shortly after being sent Ambassadour from his country vnto the same tyrant, Dionysius sending him two gownes, praying him to choose which of the two he would cary to his daughter: he answered, that she her selfe could best chuse which was the fitter, and so caried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes: the warres of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruellous lōg. For after the ouerthrow of the army which the ATHENIANS had sent into SICILIA, whē euery man thought they had vtterly lost all their force by sea, and that by all coniecture they should soone after loose all by land also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the state, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he set the ATHENIANS a flote againe, and made them as strong by sea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who thereupon began to quake for feare, and to looke eftsoones for a fresh warre, perceiuing that they stood in need of a greater power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereupon they made Lysander their Admirall, who arriuing in the citie of EPHESVS, found them very well affected towardes him, & maruellous willing and ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS part: howbeit otherwise in very poore state, and ready almost to take vp all the barbarous manners and fashions of the PERSIANS, because they did continually frequent them, being enuironned round about with the coūtry of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIAES captaines were euer resident. Wherefore, hauing planted his camp there, he brought thither marchants and shippes out of all parts, and set vp an arsenall or store house to build gallies in: so that in short space, by oft recourse of marchants that began to trade thither, he quickened their customes, and set vp their staple againe for the traffick of marchandise, and filled euery priuate officers house with an honest trade to make them rich by, so that euer after it grew in continuall hope to come vnto that florishing state and greatnesse, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIAES sonnes, was come vnto the citie of SARDIS, he went thither to speake with him, and to complaine of Tisaphernes: who hauing commandement giuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulse the ATHENIANS, and to driue them from the sea, seemed to deale but coldly and faintly against them, for the fauour he bare to Alcibiades. For, furnishing the LACEDÆMONIANS very scantly with money, was an occasiō that all their army by sea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tisaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himselfe a litle odde grudge to him. Wherefore he loued Lysander maruellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tisaphernes, as also for the pleasure he tooke in his companie, because he was a man that could wonderfully please and delight noble men: by which meanes hauing wonne the fauour of this yoūg Prince, he did perswade, & also incourage him to follow this warre. And when Lysander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feasted him, and afterwardes prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberalitie, and that was, that he would freely aske him what he would, assuring him he should not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lyſander anſwered him. Sithence I ſee (Cyrus) you are ſo willing to pleaſure vs, I beſeech you and do alſo counſell you then to encreaſe the ordinary pay of our mariners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may thenceforth receaue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lyſanders bounty, and the increaſe that he would make, and cauſed ten thouſand Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the mariners, the increaſe of a halfe penny a day. This liberalitie, within few dayes after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For the moſt part of their mariners and gallie men went where they might haue the beſt pay: and ſuch as remained behind, became very dull, laſie, and ſeditious, daily troubling their Captaines & gouernours. Now though Lyſander had drawen his enemies men from them by this policie, and had done this great hurt, yet he durſt not fight it out by ſea, fearing the worthineſſe of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater ſtore of ſhippes then he had, and beſides that, was neuer ouercome by land nor by ſea, in any battell where he was generall. So it chaunced, that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of SAMOS, vnto the citie of PHOCEA, which ſtandeth vpon firme land directly ouer againſt SAMOS, and leauing the whole charge of his fleete in his abſence, with Antiochus his pylot: he being more hardie then wiſe, in ſcorne and deriſion of Lyſander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of EPHESVS, and went by the arſenall (where all their ſhippes lay in docke) with great noyſe & laughing. This put Lyſander in ſuch a heate and chafe, that firſt of all he put a few gallies to the ſea, and had him in chaſe with them. But afterwardes, perceiuing that the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after an other to the reſcue, he armed other gallies alſo: ſo that ſupplying ſtill with few on either ſide, at length they came to a maine battell, which Lyſander wanne, and hauing taken fifteen of their gallies, he ſet vp a token of triumphe and victory. When the people of ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were ſo angry with Alcibiades, that they diſcharged him preſently of his charge: and the ſouldiers alſo that lay in camp in the Ile of SAMOS, began to miſlike him, and to ſpeake ill of him. Whereupon he preſently left his camp, and went into the country of CHERRONESSVS in THRACIA. This battell was much ſpoken of then there was cauſe, by reaſon of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lyſander cauſing the ſtouteſt and boldeſt men of euery citie, aboue the common ſort, to come to EPHESVS vnto him: layed there ſecret foundations of great change and alteration, which were eſtabliſhed afterwardes in the gouernementes of cities. For he perſwaded his priuate friendes to make tribes amongeſt themſelues to winne them friendes, and to practiſe to get them into their cities into their handes: promiſing them, that ſo ſoone as the ATHENIANS were ouerthrowen, they themſelues alſo ſhould be deliuered from ſubiection of their people, and euery one of them ſhould beare chiefe rule in their country. And thus he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his wordes true. For he preferred all them that had bene his old friendes, vnto the beſt offices and charges: not ſparing to do againſt all right and reaſon, ſo that they were aduaunced by it. And this by this meanes, euery man came to take his part, and they all ſought and deſired to gratifie and pleaſe him: hoping, that what great matter ſoeuer fell out, they aſſured themſelues in maner that they ſhould obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernement in his own hands. And therefore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas comming, who came to ſucceede him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards alſo, when they ſaw by experience that he was as honeſt and iuſt a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerning which was plaine, and without any art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of ſome demy god made after the old faſhion, which had bene of ſingular beauty. But in the meane time, they wiſhed for Lyſander, as well for the tender loue and good will he bare to his friendes and them, as alſo for the profit and commoditie they got by him. So when Lyſander tooke leaue to returne home againe, all they that were in the camp, were as ſory as could be poſſible, in ſomuch as the teares ſtood in their eyes: & he on the other ſide, ſtudied to make them more affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongeſt many other things, he ſent the reſt of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had giuen him to pay the mariners: ſaying, that Callicratidas ſhould go himſelfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and finde the meanes to enterteine his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliuer, leaue, and assigne ouer the armie into his handes, commanding him the sea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his false ambition, and fowle boasting lye, aunswered him againe, and sayd. If that be true thou sayest, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the citie of MILETVM, as thou goest by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for sith thou commandest all there, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lysander thereto replied, that the armie was no more at his commandement, and that he had the charge ouer them: so he departed thence, taking his course directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexitie. For he had brought no money out of his countrey with him, neither would he compell the cities to furnish him with any, seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, to aske them money as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeetest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it lesse dishonour and reproch vnto the GRECIANS, to be ouercome by other GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, and seeke to them that had gold and siluer enough, but otherwise, no good-will nor honestly. In the end notwithstading, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his iourney towardes LYDIA, & went directly to Cyrus court: where at his first comming he willed them to let him vnderstad, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS would speake with him. One of the souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my friend, sir stranger, Cyrus is not at leasure now, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas aunswered plainly againe: Be it for, I will tary here till he haue dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, tooke him for some plaine lout, and so he went his way the first time with a mocke at their handes. But the second time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the citie of EPHESVS, cursing & banning them that at the first had so much imbased themselues, as to go sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proude and stately for their goodes and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soone as he came to SPARTA againe, he would do all that he could possible to pacifie the GRECIANS, and set them at peace one with an other, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, and also that they should medle with them no more, nor need their aide to destroy one an other. But Callicratidas hauing the noble hart of a SPARTAN, and being to be compared in iustice, valiancy, and greatnesse of courage, with the most excellentest GRECIANS in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost vpon the Iles ARGINVSA. Wherefore, the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they altogether sent an Ambassade vnto SPARTA, by whom they made request to the councell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall: promising that they would do all things with better courage and good will vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captaine they could send thē. So much did Cyrus also write vnto them. But because there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twise Admirall, and besides, they being willing to grant the request of their confederates, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lysander the whole authoritie of all things. Who was marueilous welcome vnto them, and specially vnto the heades and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: because that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authoritie from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and had open magnanimitie in the manners of a gouernour and generall, when they came to compare Lysander with Callicratidas, they found that Lysander had a fine subtill head, and did more in warres with his policie and subtiltie, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he esteemed iustice, when it fell out profitable: and tooke profit, for iustice and honestie, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that sayd that the race of Lyons should not make warres with craft and subtiltie. For sayd he, when the lyons skinne will not serue, we must helpe it with the case of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that, which they write he did in the citie of MILETVM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promised aide for destruction of the peoples authoritie, and to driue their enemies out of the city:

be ranged in battell ray, by the sea side. The next morning at sunne rising, the ATHENI-began to row with all their gallies set in order of battell in a fronte. But Lysander, though his ships in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not that against them, but sending out pinnasies vnto the first galleys, commaunded them ly that they should not stirre at all, but keepe themselues in order, making no noise, wing against the enemie. Though the ATHENIANS also were retired in the night, he mo[r]ning the souldiers leaue to come to lande out of the galleys, before he had sent first three gallies to discrie the fleete of his enemies: who brought him word that they had the ATHENIANS take lande. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the also all in one sorte: so that the ATHENIANS began to be bolde of themselues, and to their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for feare of them, and durst not come for-
In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the country of CHERRONESVS, certaine places which he had conquered) came riding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, the Captaines and generals of the armie, the great faultes they committed. First, for they had cast ancker, and kept their ships in an open place, where there was no manner of[f]our, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any storme: and worst of all, because that they were the their victuals farre off, at the citie of SESTOS, vnto which hauen they should rather themselues vnto, considering that they had but a litle way to go, & also that they should the citie to backe them, which would furnish them with all things necessarie: and bethey should be further off from their enemies, which were gouerned by one generall that did commaund them all, and were so well trained, that at a whistle they were ready to execute his commaundement. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captaines of the THENIANS were not only misliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that an-him very lewdly: that he had nothing to do to commaunde the armie, but other that the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quietly went his way.
fifth day, the ATHENIANS hauing made the same countenance to present battell vnto enemies, and retyring the same night as of custome very negligently, and in ill order, as that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lysander sent againe certaine galliots to discrie commanding the Captaines of the same, that when they perceiued the ATHENIANS off their galleys and taken land, they should then returne backe with all possible speede could, and being mid way ouer the straights, that they should lift vp a copper target into vpon the top of a pike in the foredecke, for a signe to make all the whole fleete to battell. Now Lysander himselfe in the meane time went in person from galley to galswading and exhorting euery Captaine that they should put their galliots, mariners, & ers in good readinesse, to the end that when the signe should be lifted vp, they should with all their might in battell against the enemies. Wherfore, so soone as the copper tar-was set vp in the aire, and that Lysander had made his trumpet sound out of the Admirall, token to hale out into the sea: the galleys immediatly began to row for life in enuie one other, and the footemen that were vpon the land, ran with speede also to the toppe of a cliffe neere vnto the sea, to see what would be the end of his fight, because the distance one side to the other in that place was not fully two miles, which they had soone cut , and in a litle space, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their owers. Conon the chiefe Captaine of the ATHENIANS perceiuing from the shore this great fleete coming with a full force to assault them: he then cried out to the souldiers that they should to their shippes, and being in a rage to see things in this danger, called some by their others, others he intreated, and the rest he compelled to take their galleys. But all his diligence was to no purpose, because the souldiers were wholly scattered here and there. For so as they were set a lande out of their galleys at their returne, some went to buy prouis went a walking in the fieldes, some were set at supper in their cabines, and other w downe to sleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their ignorance and lack of experience. But when the enemies were ready to ioyne and them with great cries and noise of owers, Conon hauing eight galleys, stale secretly fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, saued himselfe in the Ile of CYPRVS. In the meane PELOPONNESIANS falling vpon the other gallies, tooke some of them emptie, the others as the souldiers began to come aboard vpon them. And as for the men, so slaine by their ships as they ranne vnto them like naked men without weapon, and order, thinking to haue saued themselues: other were killed in flying, because the landed and had them in chase. And there were taken aliue of them, three thousand with the Captaines. Lysander moreouer tooke all the whole fleete of their ships galley excepted called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he fastned the galleys that were taken, vnto the galleys, and returned with songs of triumphe, with the sound of flutes and hobboys, the citie of LAMPSACVS, hauing wonne a great victory with little labour, and had small time, the long continuing and most diuerse warre that euer was, and had brou so many sundrie strange euents of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene in tels fought both by sea and land, and had altered many sundry times, and there wa that time moe Captaines, than in all the other warres of GREECE together: all wh at the length brought to end and determined, by the good wisedome and conduction onely man. And therefore some thought, that this great ouerthrow was giuen by and said: that at the departure of Lysanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS set vpon the fleete of the enemies, they perceiued ouer Lysanders galley the two fires they call the starres of Castor and Pollux: the one on the one side of the galley, and on the other side. They say also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did signifie ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a great stone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which stone is seene yet vnto this den in great reuerence by the inhabitants of the citie of CHERRONESVS. It is said Anaxagoras did prognosticate, that one of the bodies tyed vnto the vaulte of the should be pluckt away, and should fall to the ground by a sliding and shaking that pen. For he said, that the starres were not in their proper place where they were first considering that they were heauy bodies, and of the nature of stone: howbeit that shine by reflection of the fire elementary, and had bin drawne vp thither by force, were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the elemet, euen as at the b of the world they had bin staied and let from falling downe beneath, at that time wh paration was made of the colde and heauy bodies, from the other substance of the world. There is an other opinion of certaine Philosophers, where there is more li then in that. For they say, that those which we call falling starres, be no fluxions no tions of the fire elementarie, which are put out in the aire, in a manner so soone lighted: nor also an inflammation or combustion of any part of the aire, which b ouermuch quantity doth spread vpwards: but they are celestiall bodies, which by s nesse of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of heauen, are throwne and c here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more often abro great Ocean sea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his boke of religion, that the spac score and fifteene yeares together, before that this stone did fall, they saw a great continually in the aire like a clowd inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, and came with diuerse broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the starres do that fall. when this great body of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the cou that they were a litle boldened from their feare and wonder, came to the place to se was: and they found no manner of shew or apparance of fire: but onely a very great stone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in comparison of the least part of that which the compasse of this bodie of fire did shew, if we may so name it. Sure herein, Damachus words had needs fauourable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boisterous winde did teare from the toppe of a mountaine, and caried in the aire, so long as this hurle winde continued: but so soone as that was downe, and calme againe, the stone fell immediatly. Neither doe we say that this lightning bodie, which appeared so many daies in the element, was very fire inflamed, which comming to dissolue and to be put out, did beget this violent storme and boysterous winde in the element, that had the force to teare the stone in sunder, and to cast it downe. Neuertheless, this matter requireth better discourse in some other booke then this. But how to our story. When the three thousand ATHENIANS that were taken prisoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the counsell to be put to death: Lysander calling Philocles, one of the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens so cruell and wicked counsell. Philocles being nothing abashed to see himselfe in that miserie, answered him. Accuse not them that haue no iudge to heare their cause: but since the gods haue giuen thee grace to be conqueror, do with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had said so, he went to wash himselfe, and then put on a faire cloake vpon him, as if he should haue gone to some feast: and went lustily the formost man to execution, leading his countrime the way, as Theophrastus writeth. After this done, Lysander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the sea coast, where he commanded so many ATHENIANS as he found, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderstand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the walles of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lack of victuals: for otherwise they would haue troubled him sore, if they had had wherewithall to haue maintained long siege. But in all the cities as he passed by, if they were gouerned by the authoritie of the people, or if that there were any other kinde of gouernment, he left in euery one of them a LACEDEMONIAN Captaine or gouernor, with a counsell of ten officers: of them that had been before in league and amity with him the which he did as well in the cities that had euer been confederates and friends vnto the LACEDEMONIANS, as in them that not long before had been their enemies. So he went sayling all alongst the coastes, faire and softly making his hast, stablishing in manner a generall principallity ouer all GREECE. For he did not make choise of officers that were the richest, the noblest, or honestest men, but such as were his friends, and of those tribes which he had placed in euery city: & to them he gaue authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, and would be present himselfe in person to helpe them to put to death, whom they would condemne, or otherwise to depulse or banish their countrie. By this gaue the GRECIANS small hope of good or gratious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACEDEMONIANS. Wherefore, me thinkes that Theopompus the comicall Poet dotted, when he compared the LACEDEMONIANS vnto tauerners wines, saying: that they had giuen the GRECIANS a taste of the sweete drinke of libertie, and that afterwards they had mingled it with vinegar. For, the taste they gaue the GRECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very sharpe vnto them: because Lysander tooke the rule and authoritie of gouernment out of the peoples hands, and gaue it vnto a fewe of the boldest, and most seditious in euery cities. Thus hauing spent a great time in this voyage, to make these alterations before vnto LACEDEMON, that he was comming with two hundred saile: he sailed vnto the kings Agis and Pausanias, in the countrie of ATTICA, perswading him that if he could win the citie of ATHENS at the first assault. But when he saw his purpose failed, and that the ATHENIANS did valiantly resist him: he returned once againe with his fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the manner of gouernment through euery city in equall maner, stablishing a counsell of ten officers onely in euery one of them, and putting euery where many citizens to death, & banishing many also. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their country, and restored againe all them that had bene banished before: and the city of SESTOS also, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not suffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their citie, their houses, and lands, vnto ship maisters, officers of gallies, and galley slaues, that had bene in the warres with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were against him, and this was the first thing that they did forbid him: for they restored the SESTIANS, against his will, vnto their lands and goods againe. But all the GRECIANS were very much offended, to see the parts Lysander plaied: so were they all well glad gaine, to see these others which he afterwards did. For he restored the ÆGINETES gaine to their lands and houses, who had bin put from them a long time. He restored also the MELIANS, and the SCIONÆIANS to their lands againe, which the ATHENIANS had taken from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised that the citizens and inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched sore for lacke of victuals, he came againe, and came into the hauen of PIRÆA: by meanes whereof he kept the citie so straight that he made them yeelde vpon such conditions as he himselfe would. Howbeit there are certain LACEDÆMONIANS that say, Lysander wrote vnto the EPHORES: the city of Athens is taken. And that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuised to make the matter seeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori sent vnto him, were these. The Lords of the councell of LACEDÆMON haue thus decreed that ye do raise the fortification of the hauen of PIRÆA. That ye doe ouerthrow also the long wall that ioyneth the hauen to the citie. That ye yeeld vp and redeliuer all the cities which they do holde, and content your selues with your liues and country only. This doing, ye shall haue peace, so that yee performe our demaunds. That ye shall receiue those which are banished: and for the number of ships, yee shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counsell of Theramenes, the sonne of Agnon. Who when a young orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were so bold to dare to do, or say, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themistocles had said before time, to assent vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the wall which he built in despight of them, should by their commandement now be rased: he answered him openly againe, saying, Mah, my friend, I do nothing contrary to Themistocles doings. For like as he then counselled to build the wall, for the safety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in Athens at that time: euen so doe we that are here now, for the selfe same cause pluckе it downe and raise it. And if it be true that walles doe make cities happy, then it must needs follow that the city of SPARTA which neuer had any walles, should be the vnfortunatest of all other. So Lysander hauing receiued all the ATHENIANS ships but twelue, and the walls of the city, he vsed them at his pleasure: on the fixteenth day of march (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had wonne the battell by sea, within the straight of SALAMINA, against the PERSIA) he counselled them straight to change the forme of their gouernement. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruellously offended withall. Whereupon Lysander sent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made betweene them, for that their walles were yet standing, the ten dayes being expired in which they promised to ouerthrow them: and therefore that he would hooe againe referre it to the determination of the councell, how they should be vsed, that had broken the articles and couenants of the first peace. Other say, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberation of the councell of their confederates, that is to say, whether they should altogether destroy the city, and make the inhabitants thereof slaues, and bondmen or no. In this counsell it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should not only raise the city, and make the country a desert: so that it should neuer after be tilled for corne, but for pasturage of beasts. But hauing this diet and councell, there was a banket made vnto all the Captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden. And there was a Phocian a singer of songes, that sang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by Euripides, which began in this sort.

I come now to your courtes, which lie both wide and waste,

These words moued all the hearers with compassion, so that the most part of them thought it were too great a sinne to destroy so noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wise men, and great persons. Wherefore Lysander, when the ATHENIANS had submitted themselues altogether to his wil, caused all the wome-plaiers of pipes or shalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne campe also, & with the sound of their instruments he made the walles and fortifications of the city of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, and set all their gallies on fire, & burnt them in the presence of the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who daunced and plaied in the meane season with garlands of flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediatly after he changed also the state of the gouernment, establishing a counsell of thirty Magistrates in the city, and other ten also in the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing all equall and like authoritie: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of SPARTA Captaine of the castell there, and left a good garrison of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his staffe he had in his hand to strike Autolycus withall, a strong made man to wrestle: whereupon Xenophon the Philosopher made his booke in olde time, called Conuiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wrestler, hauing all the sleights of wrestling, suddainly tripped Callibius with his legge, and lifting him vp at the armes end, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lysander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he should haue remembred (if he had bene wise) that he had the gouernment ouer free men, and not of bonde men. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty gouernours of the city, to satisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he tooke sea againe, and went into the country of THRACIA, and sent by Gylippus before vnto SPARTA (who had bin Captaine and generall of the SYRACVSANS in SICILIA) all the gold and siluer that was left in his hands, with all the presents besides which had bene priuately giuen him, and with the crownes also that had bin presented him: which were maruellous in number as it is to be thought, for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, and that in manner he was chiefe and sole prince of all GREECE. This Gylippus did rippe the seames of euery bagge in the bottome where the money was, and tooke a good summe out of euery of them: and afterwards sowed them vp againe, not thinking that there had bin a border vpon euery bagge, vpon the which was declared, the number and kindes of gold and siluer that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the money he had stolne vnder the house eauings, and went and deliuered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, shewing them Lysanders seale, which he had set to euery one of them. The Ephori hauing opened the bags, and tolde the money, found that the summe agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the faulte was. But a seruant of Gylippus told them in darke words, saying: that vnder the tiles of his maisters house there lay a great number of owles. Now the greatest part of the coine of golde and siluer which was currant through GREECE, was stamped with the marke of an owle, by reason of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after so many noble exploites done in warres, committing so shamefull a vile a deede, was banished out of his countrie of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wisest men of SPARTA, and of deepest iudgement, fearing the power of golde and siluer, and seeing by the example of Gylippus doings, that it had such power to make one of their chiefest men to fall through couetousnesse: they greatly blamed Lysander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beseeching the Ephori that they would send all this golde & siluer out of SPARTA, as a plague, prouocation, and wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they should haue no other money, but their owne onely. Whereupon they referred all to the wisedom and determination of the councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did moue the councell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the first that spake against it in the councell, that they should not admit, nor receiue into the city of SPARTA any money of golde or siluer: but should onely content themselues with their owne countrie iron money, the which first of all, comming from the fire redde hotte, was quenched with vineger, to the end they should be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vse. For it was so ger and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more conuert it to any other pose: and beside, it was very heauie and vnhandsome to remoue, considering that a heape and quantitie of it, was but of small value. And it seemeth they did vse of olde time taine litle iron money, and in some places copper money, called Obeliſci, from whence small peeces of money now extant are called Oboli, whereof six make a Drachma, so ter for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuertheleſſe, at the earneſt ſute of Ly friends that ſtood againſt it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the councell, th money ſhould remaine in the city, and ordained that it ſhould be currant onely but for faires of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either loc or keepe any money, that he ſhould ſuffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his feared gold and ſiluer, and not the couetouſneſſe and auarice which the gold and ſiluer eth with it. The which was not taken away ſo much, prohibiting priuate men to haue was ingendred only by a common tolleration of getting it. For, the profit which they brought withall, made it to be eſteemed and deſired. For it was vnpoſſible they ſhould a thing priuately for vnprofitable, which they ſaw reckoned of commonly, as a thing neceſſary: & that they ſhould thinke it would not ſerue their turne priuately, ſeeing it ſo monly eſteemed and deſired. But we are rather to thinke, that priuate mens manners are formed according to the common vſes and cuſtomes of cities: then that the faults and of priuate men do fill cities and commonweales with ill qualities. And it is more likely the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out that the parts corrupted ſhould drawe the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary faults of a part deſtroied, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes ſed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that tooke this reſolu their counſell at that time, to haue money in the commonwealth: made feare of puniſh and of the lawe, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houſes, to keepe that no ſhould come into them. But all this while they made no inward prouiſion, to keepe th of their ſoules from all paſſion and greedy deſires of money: but to the contrary, the them all to haue a couetous deſire to be rich, as if it were a great and honorable thing. that we haue heretofore in other places reproued the LACEDÆMONIANS. And mo Lyſander cauſed a ſtatue of braſſe to be made like himſelf of the ſpoile he had gotten of mies, to ſet it vp in the citie of DELPHES, and for euery priuate Captaine of the gallie caſe and the two ſtars of Caſtor and Pollux in gold beſides, which vaniſhed away a litle the battell of LEVCTRES, and no man knew what became of them. Againe, in the of the treaſury of Braſidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was alſo a galley made and iuory, of two cubits long, which Cyrus ſent vnto him after the victory he had w ſea, of the ATHENIANS. But all this accordeth not which all the other hiſtoriographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lyſander be then, and of greater power then euer any GRECIAN was before him: caried a gre and countenance then became his hability. For, as Duris writeth, he was the firſt of CIANS vnto whom they did euer erect any aulters, and offer ſacrifice vnto as a god, nour of whom they did firſt ſing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good m one which began in this manner.

ll of siluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHORIAN, and Niceratus born HERACLEA, which did both write verses to honour him, striuing whether of them should best Lysander iudged the crowne and victory vnto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was angry, that he rased out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was yong, allowed Antimachus because he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blinde the vnderstanding of the ignorant, as blindnesse doth the sight of the bodie. Aristonus an excellent plaier of the citerne, and one that had fixe times won the prises in the Pythian games: to winne Lysanders fauor, promised him, that if euer he wanne the prise in his art againe, he would cause him selfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slaue. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grieuous, onely vnto great persons, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompencing his friendes, as in punishing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his friendes and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibilitie of pardon. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the city of MILETVM, where, fearing least they would flie that tooke part with the people, & because he would haue them appeare he bid them selues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would doe them no hurt at all. The more men gaue credit to his word. But so soone as they came out, and did appeare, hee deliuered them all into the handes of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefest of the nobility) and put them all to death: and they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with an other. He caused great murders of people also to bee done in other cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had priuatly offended him, but numbers besides, onely to satisfie and reuenge the priuate quarrels, enmities and couetousnes of his friends, whom he had in euery place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: That GREECE could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus writeth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his insolency, and vaine glory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuere nature, & sharpe conditions, that made his power fearfull & intollerable. Neuertheless, the LACEDÆMONIANS passed ouer all other complaintes exhibited against him: sauing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lysander had done him, spoiling and destroying the country vnder his gouernment. Then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his friendes and Captaines that had serued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and siluer in his house contrary to the law, put him to death. And to him selfe they sent immediatly that which they call Scytale, (as who would say, the scrolle written vppon a round staffe) commaunding him that he should returne immediatly vpon receite thereof. The Scytala is in this sort. When the Ephori doe send a Generall, or an Admirall to the warres, they cause two litle round staues to bee made of the like bignesse and length, of which the Ephori do keepe the one, and the other they giue to him whom they send to the warres. These two litle staues they call Scytales. Now when they will aduertise their Generall secretly of matters of importaunce, they take a scrolle of parchement, long and narrowe like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round staffe, leauing no voide space betweene the knottes of the scrowle. Afterwardes when they haue wound them fast together, then they write vppon the parchement thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done writing, vnfolde it, and send it to their Generall, who can not else possibly read it to know what is written, (because the letters are not ioyned together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rowle of wod which was vnder him at his departure. And then wreathing the scrowle of parchment about it which he receiueth, the folding and wreaths of the parchement falling iust into the selfe same place as they were first folded, the letters also come to ioyne one with an other, as they ought to doe. This litle scrowle of parchement also is called as the rowle of wodde, Scytala euen as we commonly see in many places that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchement scrowle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the country of HELLESPONT, he was maruellouſly troubled withall, fearing aboue all other things the cuſations of Pharnabazus: ſo he ſought meanes to ſpeake with him before he departed, thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lyſander prayed would write an other letter vnto the Lords of SPARTA, contrary to his firſt, how that done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cauſe to complaine of him: but he did not ber that he was a CRETAN, (as the common prouerbe ſayeth) that could deceiue CRETAN. For Pharnabazus hauing promiſed him that he would performe his deſire, letter openly, purporting the effect of Lyſanders requeſt: but behinde he had an other trary effect, ſo like on the out ſide vnto the other, that by ſight no man could diſcerne from the other. And when he came to put his ſeale, he changed the firſt with the laſt hidden, & gaue it him. When Lyſander came vnto SPARTA, he went as the maner is, to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking them he ſhould haue beene cleared from all daunger of the greateſt accuſations they haue burdened him withall: becauſe that Pharnabazus was very well thought on of the of LACEDÆMONIA, for that he did euer ſhew him ſelfe willing and ready to helpe the all their warres, more then any other of the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA. The Ephori red this letter, they ſhewed it vnto him. Then did Lyſander plainly ſee, that the common uerbe was true.

Lyſander carieth letters againſt him ſelfe.

That Vlyſſes was not ſubtill alone.

Thereupon he went home to his houſe maruellouſly troubled. But within few daies returning to the pallace againe to ſpeake with the Lords of the councell, he told them muſt needes make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to diſcharge certaine which he had vowed and promiſed to him before he had wonne the battels. Some ſay, deede Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did beſiege the city of the APU IANS, in the countrey of THRACIA, and that by his commaundement he raiſed the ſiege charged them of the city, that they ſhould thanke Iupiter Ammon, and do ſacrifice vnto by reaſon whereof, they thinke that he ment good faith, when he ſued for licence to make voyage into LIBYA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the moſt part tainely beleeue that he made ſute to go this iourney, for a cloke and colour only to abſent ſelfe, becauſe he feared the Ephores, and that he could not endure the yoke and ſubiec which he muſt abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commanded. And this the true cauſe of his ſute to go this voyage, much like vnto a horſe taken out of a freſh and goodly medowes, to bring him into a ſtable, and make him to be iorneyed as he before. Neuertheleſſe, Ephorus writeth an other cauſe, the which I will recite hereafter. end, Lyſander hauing hardly obtained licence, tooke ſhippe, and croſſed ſaile. But duri abſence, the kings of LACEDÆMON remembring that he kept all the cities at his comm dement, by meanes of the friends he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouern of the ſame, and that by their meanes he came in maner to be abſolute prince ouer all Gre they tooke vppon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into handes of the people, and alſo to put downe his friendes whom he had ſtabliſhed there hereupon fell out great inſurrection againe. For firſt of all, they that were baniſhed fro THENS, hauing ſurpriſed and taken the caſtell of Phyla, vpon the ſodaine did ſet vpon the ty gouernors tyrants (whom Lyſander had placed there) and ouercame them in battell. W upon Lyſander ſtraight returned to SPARTA, and perſwaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to the gouernment to the number of a few, and to puniſh the inſolency of the people. So procurement, they ſent firſt a hundred talents vnto the thirty tyrants for an aide to ma this warre, and appointed Lyſander him ſelfe generall. But the two kings of SPARTA him, and fearing leaſt he ſhould take the city of ATHENS againe: they determined that them would go. Whereupon Pauſanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance to maintaine the tyrants againſt the people: but in effect, he did his indeuour to appea warre, for feare leaſt Lyſander by means of his friends and followers ſhould once againe to haue the city of ATHENS in his power, the which he might eaſily doe. And thus greed the ATHENIANS againe one with an other, and pacified all faction and commo to content them, neither with fond oſtentation of glory, but ſeuerely, for the profit and modity of SPARTA. It is true he would giue great words, and was terrible to them that ſted him. As he aunſwered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their confines with LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſeemed to alledge the beſt reaſons. Euen they (ſayd he) that ſhall ue the ſtronger hereby (ſhewing them his ſword) ſhall bee they that ſhall plead their cauſe for their confines. An other time, when a MEGARIAN had told his mind boldly enough open councell, he aunſwered him: thy wordes (good friend) had neede of a city, meaning reby that he was of too meane a towne to vſe ſo great words. And to the BOEOTIANS al-who were in doubt to profeſſe them ſelues friends or enemies: he ſent vnto them, to know

CORINTHIANS alſo were reuolted from their alliance, he brought his army hard vnto ir walles: but when hee ſaw his men were afraide, and made curſey whether they ſhould to the aſſault or not: by chaunce ſpying a hare comming out of the towne ditches, he ſayed to them: Are ye not aſhamed to be afraied to go & aſſault your enemies that are ſo coward-and ſlothfull, as hares do keepe their formes at eaſe within the circuite of their walles? Now Agis being deceaſed, he left behinde him his brother Ageſilaus, and his ſuppoſed ſon Leo- tychides. Wherefore, Lyſander that had loued Ageſilaus afore time, gaue him counſell to ſtand the right of the crowne, as lawfull heire and next of the bloud, deſcending of the race of rcules: becauſe it was ſuſpected that Leotychides was Alcibiades ſonne, who ſecretly had kept Agis wife, at what time he was baniſhed out of his countrey, and came then to remaine SPARTA. And Agis ſelfe alſo, concluding by reckoning of the time of his abſence, that his could not be with childe by him: made reckoning of Leotichides, (and had openly ſheall the reſt of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his ſonne, vntill ſuch as falling ſicke of that diſeaſe whereof he died, he was caried to the city of HERÆA. And lying in his death bedde, at the humble ſute of Leotychides him ſelfe, and partly at the requeſt of his friends who were importunate with him: he did acknowledge Leotychi- for his ſonne in the preſence of diuerſe, whom he prayed to be witneſſes vnto the Lords of CEDÆMON, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his ſon. Which they all in fauour of Leotychides. For all that, Ageſilaus tooke it vpon him, by the ſupport & mainnance of Lyſanders fauour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wiſe man, and knowen to be skilfull in anprophecies, did great hurt to Ageſilaus ſide, by an auncient oracle which he alledged aſt a defect Ageſilaus had, which was his lameneſſe.

O Spartan people you, which beare high haughty hearts, And looke a loft: take heede I ſay, looke well vnto your martes: Leaſt whiles you ſtand vpright, and guide your ſtate by grace, Some halting kingdome priuily, come creeping in a pace.
By that meanes might you moue, great troubles, carke and care,
And miſchiefes heape vpon your head, before you be aware.
And plunged ſhould you be, euen ouer head and eares, VVith waſt of warres, which here on earth doth periſh many peeres.

Many by occaſion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides part: but Lyſander declared vnto , that Diopithes did not conſtue the meaning of the oracle well. For God, ſayed he, cared whether he halted of one legge or no, that ſhould come to be king of LACEDÆMON: but eede, the crowne and kingdome ſhould halt and be lame, if baſtardes not lawfully begotould come to raigne ouer the true naturall iſſue and right line of Hercules. By theſe perions, Lyſander with his great countenaunce and authority beſides, wanne all men to his ion: ſo that Ageſilaus by this meanes, was praclaimed king of LACEDÆMON. This done, der beganne ſtraight to counſell him to make warres in ASIA, putting him in hope that he should destroy the kingdome of PERSIA, and should come to be the greatest man of world. Moreouer, he wrote vnto his friends in the cities of ASIA, that they should send the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Agesilaus for their general, to make wars against barbarous people. Which they did, and sent Ambassadors purposely vnto SPARTA to see they might haue him: the which was no lesse honor procured vnto Agesilaus by Lysander meanes, then that he did, in making him to be chosen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwise not vnapt nor vnfit to commaund, haue this imperfection: that through icalousie of glory, they doe commonly enuy their equalles, the which doth greatly hurt them for doing any notable things. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue, whose seruice and meanes might helpe them to doe great matters. Thus Agesilaus being chosen generall of this enterprise, tooke Lysander with him in this iourney, amongst the rest of his counsellers which were giuen vnto him to assist him: and made speciall choise of him, as one whose counsell he hoped most to be gouerned, and to haue him neerest about him, as his chiefest friend. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the countrey hauing no acquaintance with Agesilaus, seldome spake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing euer before giuen Lysander of long time, they followed him, and waited vppon him to his tent or lodging: some to honor him, because they were his friends, others for feare, because they did make much of him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that shall play the person of some messenger or seruaunt, shall be the best liked, and shall haue the best voice to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrary, that he which hath the royall band about his head, and the scepter in his hand, a man doth scant heare him speake. Euen so it fell out then: for all the dignity due vnto him that commaunded, was shewed only vnto the counseller: and there remained to the king no more, but the bare name only of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinkes that this vndiscreet and importunate ambition of Lysander, did well deserue reproofe perhappes, to make him only be contented with the second place of honor next vnto the king. But for Agesilaus again, this extreame couetousnes and icalousie of glory, to cast Lysander altogether off, and to set him by his friend and benefactor, that surely became not him neither. For first of all, Agesilaus neuer gaue Lysander occasion to doe any thing, neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honorable for him: but which is worst of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mens causes in hand, and that he did fauour them, he did alwaies send them packing againe into their countrey, denying their suite, without that they could obtaine any thing they sued for, lesse then the meanest persons that could haue come, extinguishing Lysander credit by litle and litle, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lysander perceiuing how he was thus refused and reiected in all things, seeing that the countenance and fauor which he thought to shew vnto his friends, fell out hurtful vnto them: left off to solicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to visit him, but to go to the king, and vnto those that could doe them better pleasure then him: and specially those that honored him. When they heard that, many desisted to trouble him any more in matters of importaunce, but not to doe him all the honor they could, and continued still to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwise to exercise himself: the which did aggrauate and increase Agesilaus anger more against him, for the enuy he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge and commission in the warres, sometimes vnto very meane souldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lysander surueyor generall of all the ordinary prouision of victuals, and distributer of flesh. And then said the king the IONIANS that did honor him so much: let them go now, sayd he, and honor my distributer. Wherefore, Lysander seeing it high time to speake: went vnto Agesilaus, and said vnto him in few wordes after the LACONIAN manner: Truely Agesilaus, thou hast learned well to abase thy friends. In deede sayed he againe, so haue I, when they will be greater then my selfe. And to the contrary, they that maintaine and increase my honor and authority, it is reason I esteeme of them. Yea mary, sayd Lysander, but perhappes I haue not done as thou sayest. I pray thee giue me such an office, as I may be least hated, and most profitable for thee: that it be but in respect of strangers eyes that looke vpon vs both. After this talke betweene them

Agesilaus sent him his Lieutenaunt into the countrey of HELLESPONT, where Lysander still kept this anger secret in his heart against him, but for all that, did not leaue to doe all that hee could for the benefit of his masters affairs. As amongst many other things, he caused a PERSIAN Captain called Spithridates, to rebel against his master, who was a valiant man of his hãds, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army also which he brought with him vnto Agesilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iourney. Wherefore, he returned againe to SPARTA not long after, with little honor, being maruellously grieued & offended with Agesilaus, and hating more then before, all the state and gouernment of the city of SPARTA: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time thought vppon, concerning the alteration of gouernment, and his enterprise was this. Amongst the offspring and issue of Hercules, who were mingled with the DORIANS, and returned againe into the country of PELOPONNESVS, the greatest number and chiefest of them, dwelled in the city of SPARTA: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of succession to the crowne, sauing two families only, the Eurypontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of bloud descended out of one selfe house, yet had they no more right nor interest vnto the realme, then the residue of the people: for, the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were giuen vnto the inhabitantes that could deserue them. Lysander then being one of those which was descended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the crowne: when he saw himselfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous actes and merites, and that he had wonne many friendes, and great credit and authority by dealing in matters of the state: it grieued him much, to see that they which were no nobler then him selfe, should be kings in that city, which hee had increased by his vertue, and that he could not haue so much power as to take from these two houses, the Eurypontides, and the Agiades the prerogatiue that the kings should be chosen onely out of one of those two houses, and to cast it vpon the offspring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the issue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall SPARTANS also: because that Hercules race should not only desire this reward of honor, but euen they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honor. For he doubted not, but if they would dispose the crowne in this sort, that there was no man in the city of SPARTA that should sooner be chosen king then him selfe: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his citizens by very good reasons, and to bring this about the more easie, he conned an oration without booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnassæus, made him for this purpose. But afterwardes waighing with him selfe, that so great and strange a change as he would bring in, had needs of some better and stronger helpe: he beganne to frame a deuise (they say) to moue the people by, much after the manner they vse in tragedies, framing engines to bring some god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained inuention. He deuised certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rethoricke would find him in no steade, if first of all he did not fill the citizens hearts with some superstition and feare of the goddes, that he might bring them afterwardes more easily vnto reason. And Ephorus sayeth, that he proued first to corrupt the Nunne with money, that giueth all the oracles and aunswers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwardes, he would haue wonne the Nun also of the temple of DODONE with money, by Pherecles practise. And that he being reiected by them both, went lastly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he spake vnto the priestes, and offered them great store of money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lysander, that they sent men of purpose to SPARTA, to accuse him, that he would haue corrupted them with money. The counsell clearing Lysander of this accusation, the LIBYANS his accusers at their departing sayd: we will one day iudge more iustly, when you my Lordes of LACEDÆMON haue done now, when you shall come to dwell in our country of LIBYA: supposing there was an auncient prophecy that sayd, the LACEDÆMONIANS one day should come to dwell in the country of LIBYA. But we shall doe better to write the whole story at large of this practise, subtilty, and malicious deuise, which was no matter of small importaunce, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall proposition there were many great coniectures and presuppositions, and many long circumstances to bring it to conclusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an historiographer and philosopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the realme of PONT, a woman that fayed she was gotten with childe by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleeue at all, and many also did beleeue it: so that she being deliuered of a goodly sonne, diuerse noble men and of great estate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This childe, I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lysander catching the plat of his deuise from thence, added to all the rest of him selfe, to goe on with his practise. Now hee had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this matter, in suing out a rumor of the birth of this childe, without any suspition gathered out of the truth of this rumor. And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which they had perused abroad through the city of SPARTA; to wit: that the priestes of the temple kept secret bookes of very ancient oracles, which they themselues durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man read them, vnlesse he were begotten of the seede of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priestes that kept these papers, or that by some secret marke and token, which they had amongst them: & thereby being knowen for Apolloes son, he might then take the bookes and read the auncient reuelations and prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this sort, there was order taken that Silenus should come and aske for these bookes as though he were the sonne of Apollo: and that the priestes which were priuy to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know that they should deliuer these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene in deede Apolloes sonne: and that he should openly read them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the prophecies, that he should read that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of LACEDÆMONIA: that it was better, and meeter for the SPARTANS they should choose them for their kinges, whom they found the meetest men of all their magistrates. But when Silenus was come of full age, and brought into Greece purpose to performe this practise, all the mistery was marde by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lysander, who holpe him to countenaunce this deuise: who when the matter should haue taken effect, shrunke for feare, and let the mistery alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lysanders life time, till after his death. For he died before king Agesilaus returned out of ASIA, being fallen into warres with BOEOTIA before his death; or rather hauing him selfe made GREECE to fall into warres. They doe report diuerse other way, and some lay the fault vpon him, other vpon the THEBANS, and other vpon them both: and they burden the THEBANS withall, because they did vtterly ouerthrow the common sacrifices which Agesilaus made in the city of AVLIDE. And they say also, that Androcides and Amphitheus did raise this warre among the GRECIANS, being before corrupted with money by the king of PERSIA to bring warres vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS in Greece, and began to inuade and destroy the country of the PHOCIANS. Other say that Lysander was very angry with the THEBANS, because they onely of all other their confederates did aske the tenth part of all the spoile which was won in the war against the ATHENIANS: and that they were not pleased that Lysander had set the money away vnto SPARTA. But aboue al, Lysander did malice the most, because they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to be deliuered from the oppression of thirty tyrants, whom he had stablished gouernors in ATHENS, and in whose fauour (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACEDÆMONIANS had ordained by a common edict: that they that were banished and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place soeuer they fled vnto, and that whosoeuer should resist or let them to do it, they should be proclaimed rebels, and open enemies vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. Againe to contrary this edict, the THEBANS made another very like meete for the glorious deedes of Bacchus and Hercules their ancestors, for whom it was made that euery house and city through the country of BOEOTIA, should be open for the ATHENIANS that would come thither, & that he that would not helpe a banished mã from ATHENS against him that would take him away by force, should be fined and amerced at a talent. And also if there were any souldiers that went vnto ATHENS, through the countrey of BOEOTIA,

that the THEBANS ſhould not ſee nor heare it. This was no diſſimulation to ſpeake of, that they ſhould ordaine things with ſo gentle wordes, and ſo meete for the people of GREECE, and then that the deedes ſhould not anſwere vnto their edicts and proclamations. For Thraſy- lus, and his fellowes of the conſpiracie, who kept the caſtle of Phyla, they departed from THEBES, with armor and money, and the THEBANS did helpe them to beginne and practiſe their enterpriſe ſo ſecretly, that it was not diſcouered. Theſe were the cauſes why Lyſander was ſo earneſtly bent againſt the THEBANS, and his choller being ſo extreme, by reaſon of his melancholineſſe that grew daily vpon him more and more through his age, he ſolicited the EPHORES ſo, that he perſwaded them to ſende a garriſon thither: and himſelfe taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iorney ſtraight with his men. But afterwardes they ſent king Pauſanias alſo with an armie thither, who was to fetch a great compaſſe about to enter in- to the countrie of BOEOTIA, by mount Citharon: and Lyſander ſhould goe to meete him through the coūtry of PHOCIDES, with a great company of ſouldiers beſides. Now as Lyſander went, he tooke the citie of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded theſelues to him ſoone as he came thither. From thence he went to the citie of LEBADIA, which he ſpoyled: from thence he wrote vnto king Pauſanias that departing from PLATEES, he ſhould march ſtreſtly to the citie of ALIARTE, where he would no faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne walles. Theſe letters were intercepted by certaine ſkoutes of the THEBANS, who met with the meſſenger that caried them. Thus the THEBANS hauing intelligence of their purpoſe, left their citie in cuſtodie vnto the ATHENIANS who were come to aide them: and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched all night with great ſpeede, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lyſander, and put halfe their men into the citie. Now for Lyſander, he was determined at the firſt to keepe his men vpon a hill which is neere to the city, & there to tary the comming of king Pauſanias. But afterwards when he ſaw that the day was farre ſpent, and that he came not, he could tary no longer, but running himſelfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the mean ſeaſon, the THEBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hand, did ſet vpon Lyſanders rereward of his armie againſt the foun- taine called Ciſſuſa: where the Poets faine that the nurſes of Bacchus did waſhe him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, becauſe the water that commeth out of it (though it be very cleare and ſweet to drinke) hath notwithſtanding (I cannot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine: and not far from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTIANS do alledge, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that part, & do ſhew his ſepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that alſo, there is the monu- ment of Alcmena, which was buried (as they ſay) in that place, & was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, ſtirred not vntill they ſaw that Lyſander with the firſt of his troupe was neare vnto the towne wals: and then opening the gates on the ſodaine, they made a ſaly out vppon Lyſander & ſlue him with his Soothſayer and a few other, becauſe the moſt part of the vaward fled, vnto the ſtrength of the battell. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue them not ouer ſo, but followed them ſo valiantly, that they brake their order, & maſde them all flie through the mountains, after they had ſlaine three thouſand of them in the field: ſo were there three hundred THEBANS alſo ſlaine there, who followed their enemies ſo fiercely, till they recouered ſtraight narrow paſſages, of great ſtrength for them. Theſe three hundreth were in maner all thoſe that were elected in THEBES to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS ſecretly: wherefore, for the deſire they had to take away this opinion from their citizens, they hazarded them ſelues to no purpoſe, & were caſt away in this chaſe. King Pauſanias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going from PLATEES vnto THESPIES, and went on further, marching ſtill in battell ray towards ALIARTE, where Thraſybulus alſo arriued at the ſelfe ſame time, bringing the aid of the ATHENIANS frō THEBES. And when Pauſanias was purpoſed to ſend to aske licence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had ſlain, to the intent to bury them: the old SPARTANS that were in his army, miſliking it much, at the firſt were angry in them ſelues. being lodged there, it is said there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one

When thou thy nets shalt spread, the wolues for to intrap:

LACEDEMONIANS and their confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lysanders letters were to be seene that were in his house. King Agesilaus going thither to peruse them, amongst other writings, found the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnasseus which Lysander had prepared to perswade the SPARTANS to change their gouernement, and to declare vnto them that they should reuoke the prerogatiue which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: for the kings of SPARTA could not be chosen but out of those two families, and to leaue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefest magistrates might be lawfully chosen kings of SPARTA. Agesilaus stood indifferent to haue shewed this oration openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might see what manner a citizen Lysander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a graue wise man, and president at that time of the Councell of the Ephori, would not suffer him: saying that he should not digge Lysander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him that was so passingly well, & eloquently penned to perswade. Yet notwithstanding, they did him great honour after his death: and amongst others, condemned two citizens in a great summe of money, that were made sure to two of his daughters while he liued, and refused to marrie them when he was dead, seeing their father died so poore: because they sought to match in his house, supposing he had bene rich, and forsooke them afterwards for their fathers pouertie, when they saw he died a good and iust man. Thus we see, that at SPARTA there was punishment for them that did not marrie, or that married too late, or that married ill: and to this punishment were they most subiect, that sought great matches for couetousnesse of goods: This is all we haue to write of Lysanders life and actes.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Vcius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patritians, who be the noble men and gentlemen of ROME: and there was one of his ancesters called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Consul. He notwithstanding his Consulship, wan more dishonor by defame, then he obtained honour by dignity of Consull. For they finding in his house aboue ten pounds worth of plate, contrary to the law at that time expresly forbidding it: he was expulsed the Senat, & lost his place there, after which dishonour onee receiued, his issue neuer rose, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla him selfe had very litle left him by his father: so Nymidians to be his fast and faithfull friend: whose Ambassadors, that scaped from a panie of Nymidian theeues he courteously entertained, and hauing giuen them goodresents, sent them backe againe with a safe conuoy. Now concerning King Bocchus, hee of long time both hated and feared king Iugurthe his sonne in law: insomuch, that after he s ouercome in battell, and came to him for succour, Bocchus practised treason against him for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Iugurthe should be taken by Sylla, n by himselfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a small numof souldiers to accompanie him (without respect of perill or danger) went and commit-himselfe to the faith and fidelitie of one barbarous king, to take an other: considering also the king whom he trusted was so vniust of his word, euen vnto his neerest friends & conderates. Now Bocchus hauing Iugurthe and Sylla both in his power, and brought himselfe to t pinch that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath resolue which of the two he should deale withall, in the end went on with his first plot and uise of treason, and so deliuered Iugurthe into Syllaes hands. In deede Marius triumphed for king of King Iugurthe: but his euill willers, for the spight and grudge they bare him, did at-bute the glory & honor of Iugurthes taking wholy vnto Sylla. That secretly went to Marius art, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from ase, obscure and vnknowen life to be knowen & well accepted of the people in Rome, and taste also what honor ment) became so ambitious and couetous of glory, that he caused the ry to be graue in a ring, which he did euer after vse to weare & seale withall. Where king chus was deliuering of Iugurthe vnto Sylla, & Sylla also receiuing Iugurthe prisoner. These ings misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, iudging that Sylla was not so much ened as himselfe, he tooke him with him vnto the warres. For Marius in his second Consulship, ade Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Consulship, he had charge vnder him of housand footmen, and did many notable and profitable exploits for him. When Sylla was Lieutenant, he tooke one Copillus, a generall of the Gavles Tectosages. And when he s Colonell of a thousand footemen, he brought the Marsians (a maruellous great mber of people in Italie) and perswaded them to remaine good friends, and confederats the Romaines. For this his good seruice, he found that Marius grew in great misliking him, because from thenceforth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occasion to w good seruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising. Wherefore, afterwards tooke Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Con-ship. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somwhat slacke and colde in martiall mat, which was the cause that indeed he did commit vnto Sylla all the speciall seruice, and ers of weight in his charge: whereuppon he gaue him occasion not onely to increase his mation, but also his credit and power. For, by force of armes, he conquered the most parte the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe king victuals, hauing commission, he made a maruellous great quantity of prouision to be ought thither, insomuch as Catulus campe being plentifully victualed, they sent their store & plusage vnto Marius souldiers, the which Sylla himselfe writeth, did much mislike Marius. d this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon so light occasion, s followed with ciuill warres, great effusion of bloud, and with incurable factions and disions: that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the Romaine e and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that fore-the ruines of common weales, when he counselled, and also commaunded gouernours to ambition, as a most pestilent and mortall fury vnto them that are once infected withall. w Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the warres, would haue made way open to preferre him to some honorable office in the city of Rome: he was no sooner urned from the warres but he would needes proue the peoples good willes vnto him, and ocured his name to be billed among them that sued for the Prætorshippe of the city (that is say, the office of the ordinary iudge that ministreth iustice vnto the citizens) but he was reieed by the voice of the people. For the which he layed the fault vppon the meaner sort, say-that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them see noble huntings and great fightings of wilde beastes of LIBYA. And that therefore they did choose other Prætors, and put him by his sute, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusall, for his owne act doth condemne himselfe: because the next yeare following he was chosen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with courtesie, and partly with money. So he falling out with Cæsar vppon that occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would vse the power and authoritie of his office vpon him. But Cæsar smiling, answered him: thou hast reason to call it thine office, for indeede it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But when the time of his Prætorshippe was expired, he was sent with an armie into CAPPADOCIA, louring his voiage thither with commission to restore Ariobarzanes into his kingdom again: howbeit the only cause of his iorney was indeede to suppresse king Mithridates, a litle, who tooke too many things in hande, and increased his power and dominion with a new signiorie of no lesse greatnesse, then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great armie out of ITALIE with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the confederates of the ROMAINES in euery place, through whose aide he ouerthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS, and afterwards also a greater number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like case to aide them: so that he expulsed Gordius king of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and restored Ariobarzanes to his realme againe. After which victory, Sylla remained by the riuer of Euphrates, and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassador of Arsaces, king of the PARTHIANS. Now these two nations, the ROMAINES, and the PARTHIANS, were neuer friends before: and that with other things shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came first to him by his meanes to seeke friendship with the ROMAINES. They say that receiuing this Ambassador Orobazus, he made three chayres to be brought out, the one for king Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassador, and the third for himself, which he placed in the middest betwene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaue audience vnto the Ambassadour: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwardes put Orobazus to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maner among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing himselfe stately out of time, and to no purpose. We do reade that a soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed & condered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouings and gestures of minde and body, to iudge not by the clymate of the country, but according to the rules of his arte what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayde that Sylla one day must needes come to be a great man, and that he maruelled how he could suffer in that he was not euen then the chiefest man of the world. When Sylla was returned again to ROME, one Censorinus accused him of extortion, that he had caried away a great summe of money with him, contrary to the law, out of one of their confederates countrey: howbeit he prosecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time, the enmity begunne betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe vppon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauour of ROME, and partly also for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carying tokens of triumphe, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, & next vnto them also the image of Iugurthe, which he deliuered into the handes of Sylla, being all of pure golde. This did so offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of the two, the city of ROME taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederats of ITALY bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruellous great war which turned out very dangerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMAINES, Marius did no notable exploite: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath need of a strong, lusty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, hauing done notable seruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wan the fame and estimation among the ROMAINES, of a noble souldier, and worthy Captaine: and among the enemies themselues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done

Who, when his aduerſaries & ill willers did attribute his noble deeds vnto the fauor of fortune, and did painte fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and ſnared in nets whileſt he ſlept: he tooke it in very ill parte, and was marueilous angry with them that did it, ſaying that they robbed him of the glory that iuſtly belonged vnto him. Wherfore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole diſcourſe of his doings in his voyage, he ſayed vnto them: my Lords of ATHENS, fortune hath had no part in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the gods it ſhould ſeeme were ſo angry with this fooliſh ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went vtterly againſt the haire with him: vntill at the length he came to be ſo hated of the people, that in the end they bani-ſhed him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not only patiently abide their wordes, but ſayed, he was a happy man, and ſingularly beloued of fortune: but alſo increaſing this opinion, and glorying as at a ſpeciall grace of the gods, did attribute the honour of his doings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fancie, that the gods did prouide him in all his doings. For he wrote himſelfe in his commentaries, that the enterpriſes which he hazarded moſt hottely according to the ſodaine occaſion offered, did better proſper with him, then thoſe which by good aduiſe he had determined of. Furthermore, when he ſayd that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it ſeemeth that he confeſſed all his proſperitie came rather by fortune, then by his worthineſſe. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly ſubmit himſelfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: conſidering that he did attribute it to the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the gods, that he neuer diſagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignitie and authoritie as himſelfe was. For where it was thought he would haue bene a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very curteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reaſon of the ſocietie of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counſelled him to thinke nothing more certaine and aſſured, then that which the goddes ſhould reueale vnto him, and commaund him in his nightes dreame. He writeth alſo that when he was ſent with an army vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth ſodainly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a marueilous bright flame of fire that aſcended vp to the element. The wiſe men being asked their opinions about the ſame, made anſwer that a very honeſt man, and alſo a marueilous fayer man of complexion taking ſoueraine authority in his handes, ſhould pacifie all troubles and ſedition which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla ſayed it was himſelfe whom the goddes ment, becauſe that amongſt other things he had that ſingular gift of nature, that his haire was yealow as golde: and he was not aſhamed to name himſelfe an honeſt man, after he had wonne ſo many notable great victories. Thus haue we ſufficiently ſpoken of the truſt he had in the fauour of the goddes. And furthermore, he ſeemed to be very contrary in his manners, and vnlike to himſelfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gaue as much more alſo in another. Some he preferred without cauſe: and others he put down without reaſon. He would be very gentle vnto them, of whom he would haue ought: and vnto thoſe that ſought of him, he would ſtand much vpon his honor, and looke for great reuerence. Wherby men could hardly diſcern his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vſed in puniſhing of them that had offended him: ſometimes he hanged vp men for very ſmall and light cauſes: Some other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the moſt grieuous offences in the worlde: and lightly pardoned and forgaue ſuch faultes as were in no wiſe to be forgiuen. And afterwards againe would puniſh right ſmall crimes, with murthers, effuſion of blood, and confiſcation of goods. This iudgment may be giuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging minde: but notwithſtanding he qualified that naturall bitternes with reaſon, giuing place to neceſſity, and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his ſouldiers ſlue Albinus one of his lieutenantes, beating him to death with ſtaues and ſtones, being a man of good qualitie and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he paſſed ouer with ſilence, vſing no manner of puniſhment, and turned it to a boaſt in the end, ſaying that his men were the more obedient

and diligent in any peece of seruice that was to be done, and that he made them amends for faultes by worthy seruice. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reprove him: but hauing determined with himselfe to destroy Marius, and to procure that he might be chosen generall in the warres against king Mithridates, because that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cause he flattered & curried fauor with his souldiers that serued vnder him. At his returne to ROME from these warres of the confederates, he was made Consull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeare olde, and maried with Cæcilia, noble Ladie and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe bishop of ROME; for which mariage the common people sang songs and balladeſ vp and downe ROME against him: and many of the noble men enuied him for it, thinking him vnworthy of so noble a Ladie, whom they thought worthy to be Consul, as Titus Liuius sayth. Now she was not his only wife, for he had a wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After he had maried Æelia, then that called Cælia, whom he put away because she brought him no children. But both with she went honorably away from him with very good words of her, besides many other ly rich giftes he gaue her: howbeit shortly after he maried Metella, which made them suspect that Cælia was put away for her naughtines. How soeuer it was, Sylla did euer and loue Metella: insomuch as the people of ROME afterwardes making suite, that they were banished for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and sed by Sylla, they cryed out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the cittie of ATHENS, he tooke cruelly with them, because that some of them had scoffed at Metella from the walles: how that was afterwardes. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Consulship small matter, in comparison of that which he looked for in time to come: was maruellous sirous to go against Mithridates. But therein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition uetousnes of glory stood against him, and sued to goe that iorney in like manner, being iect to those passions, which neuer waxe olde, as we may dayly see by experience. For now a heauie man, sickly of body, and broken in seruice abroade in the warres, from the he came but newly home, and bruſed moreouer with age: did notwithstanding yet haue the charge of the warres so farre off beyond the seas. Wherfore to obtaine his while Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to giue order for certaine things that be done, he remaining in the city, did practise this pestilent mortall sedition, which more hurt vnto the city of ROME, then all the enemies that ROME euer had: the goddes themselues had foreshewed by many signes and tokens. For fire tooke of it selfe statues of the ensignes, which they had much adoe to quench. Three rauens brought young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the sight of many people, and wardes caried the garbage they left of them into their neastes. Rats also hauing gnawen iewels of golde in a church, the sextens setting a trap for them, a rat was taken full of and kendled fiue young rats in the trappe, of the which shee ate vp three. But more fayre bright day when there was no cloude seene in the element at all, men heard such sound of a trumpet, that they were almost all out of their wittes, for feare of so great Wherupon the wise men and soothsayers of THVSCAN being asked their opinions them: that this so straunge and wonderfull signe did pronounce the change of the and the departure out of this into another life. For they hold opinion, that there eight worldes, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and fashions of life: vnto of the which sayed they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance. How all came to ende their course within the space of the reuolution of the great yeare: when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there are seene such wonderfull signes on the earth, or in the element. And such as haue studied that science, doe know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contary vnto the first in their liues ners, and which are either more or lesse acceptable vnto the goddes, then those which in former age. For they say, that amongest great changes and alterations which are those places from one age vnto another, the science of diuination, and foretelling of to come doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth ſtake moſt certaine and manifeſt ſignes, to know and foretell things to come. And in con-trariwiſe alſo in another age it groweth to contempt, and loſeth her reputation, for that it is very raſh, and fayleth to meete with the moſt parte of her predictions, becauſe ſhe hath but obſcure meanes, and all her inſtruments defaced, to know what ſhould come. And theſe be the fables which the wiſeſt ſoothſayers of THVSCAN reported abroad, & they ſpecially who ſeemed to haue ſome ſingular ſpeculation aboue others. But as the Senate were talking with the ſoothſayers of theſe wonders, being aſſembled together within the temple of the goddeſſe Vesta, a ſparrow came flying into the church in ſight of them all, and caried a graſſehopper in her bill, and parted it in the middeſt, and left one part within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wiſe men and interpreters of ſuch wonders, ſayed, that they doubted a commotion and riſing of the country men againſt the cõmons of the city, becauſe the common people of the cittie doe crye out continually like graſſehoppers, and the husband-men do keepe themſelues vpon their lands in the country. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the people, who in all kindes of wickednes and miſchiefe that a man can reckon, would giue place to no liuing creature: ſo that no man need not to ſeeke or demaund any where for a worſe then he, but the queſtion is rather wherein he himſelfe was not the worſt of all others. For he was full repleat with all kindes of wickedne, auarice, and raſhneſſe, and that ſo extreamely, as he cared not what villainie and wickednes he openly committed, ſo that the ſame might turne to his profit. For he had ſet vp a table in the open market place, where he ſolde freedome, making ſlaues and ſtrangers denizens of ROME for their money: and for that purpoſe he entertained a gard of three thouſand about him, beſides a band of young gentlemen of the order of knightes that attended alwaies vpon his perſon readie at his commaundement, whom he called the garde againſt the Senate.

And furthermore, himſelfe hauing paſſed a lawe by the voice of the people, that no Senator ſhould borrow nor owe aboue two thouſand Drachmas: it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beaſt, being left by Marius amongſt the people, turned all things topſie turney, by force of armes and maine ſtrength. He made alſo many wicked lawes to paſſe by voice of the people, and amongſt others, that one ſpecially, wherby he gaue Marius commiſſion to make warres againſt king Mithridates. For which extreame oppreſſions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Conſuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike cauſes, and ceaſed the common courſe of law and iuſtice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the law, in an open aſſembly in the market place, before the temple of Caſtor and Pollux: Sulpitius the tribune came vpon them with his ſouldiers, and ſlue many people, and among others, the Conſull Pompeius owne ſonne, and the father himſelfe being Conſull, had much a doe to ſaue his life by flying. And Sylla the other Conſul, was alſo purſued euen into Marius houſe, where he was compelled to promiſe before his departure, preſently to goe and reuoke the adiorne-ment of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing depriued Pompeius of his conſulſhippe, did not depoſe Sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had giuen him to make warres againſt Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And ſending colonels to the city of NOLA to receiue the army that laye there, and to bring them vnto Ma-rius, Sylla preuented them, and fled to the campe before them, and told the ſouldiers all what had paſt, as it was indeede: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and ſlue Marius colonels with ſtones. Marius on the other ſide put all Syllaes friends to death at ROME, and tooke the ſpoyle of their goodes and houſes: ſo was there nothing elſe but flying from the campe to ROME, and from ROME to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner beſide themſelues, not being able to gouerne as they would, but driuen to obey Marius & Sulpitius com-mandementes. Who being aduertiſed that Sylla was comming towards ROME, ſent ſtraight two Prætors vnto him, Brutus and Seruilius, to commund him as from the Senate, to approch no nearer. Theſe two Prætors ſpake a litle too boldly vnto Sylla: whereupon the ſouldiers fell to a mutinie, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood indifferent whether to kill them preſently in the field or no: howbeit they brake their axes and bundels of roddes which were caried before them, and tooke their purple robes wherewith they were apparelled as magiſtrates, from them, and sent them home thus shamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now to Rome, their sadde silence onely, and themselues so stripped besides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignitie, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes, but such as were the worst that possibly could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie this sedition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherfore Marius and his followers began to make themselues strong by force: and Sylla with his companion Q. Pompeius, departed in the meane time from the city of Nola, and brought six entier legions on with him, who desired no other thing but to make haste to march to Rome ward. Howbeit Sylla stood in doubt with himselfe what to doe, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill such time as his soothsayer Posthumius hauing considered the signes & tokens of the sacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his handes, and bad him bind them hard, and shut him vp fast, vntill the day of battell should be past: saying, that he was contented to suffer death, if he had not good successe, and that out of hand, to his great honour. And it is saied also, that the same night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame the goddesse Bellona, whom the Romaines do greatly honor, following therein the Cappadocians: and I know not whether it be the moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddesse of battels. So he thought, that she comming to him did put lightning into his hand, commaunding him that he should lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after another by their proper names: and that they being striken with his lightning, fell down dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This vision encoraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the same to Pompeius, his fellow consull & companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rome. Whē he was at Picines, there came other ambassadors vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and fury, declaring therwithall that the Senate would graunt him all things that should be meete and reasonable. When Sylla had heard the message, he answered them, that he would campe there: and so commaunded the martialls to deuide the squadrons according to their manner. The ambassadors beleeuing that he would so haue done indeede, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backes were no sooner turned, but Sylla straight sent Lucius Basillus, and Caius Mummius before to seaze one of the gates of Rome, and the wals which were on the side of mount Esquilin, and he himself also in person with all possible speede marched after them. Basillus entred Rome, and wan the gate by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp straight to the top of their houses, and with tyles and stones stayed, and kept him, not onely for entring any further but also draue him backe againe, euen to the very walles of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla himselfe to Rome, who seeing apparantly in what state things stoode, cryed out to his men, and bad them set fire on the houses: and himselfe taking a torch light in his hande shewed them the way what they should doe, appointing his archers and darters to hurle and bestow their dartes, and other fierie instrumentes, to the tops of the houses. Herein he was too much ouercome with vnreasonable choller, passion, and desire of reuenge. For seeking only to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to friendes, to parents or confederates, neither had he yet any maner of remorse or pitty: such and so fiery was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference betwene those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by sound of trumpet, that he would make free all the slaues that would come to his part. But forthwith came his enemies, set vpon him, and prest him so neere, that he was constrained vtterly to flie and forsake the city. Then Sylla assembling the Senate, condemned Marius, and certen others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed by a slaue of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promise past by publike edict: but whē he had made him free, he caused him to be throwen downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he proclaimed by promise a great summe of money to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and vnthankefull parte, considering that Marius not many dayes before hauing Sylla in his owne house, in his handes and custody, deliuered him from perill, and set him in safety. Which at that time he had not done, but had suffered Sulpitius to haue slaine him: himselfe had been souerain Lord of the whole without all contradictiō, and might haue ruled all things at his owne will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after vpon the like aduantage, vsed no such manner of requitall or grauitie towardes him, which bred a secret misliking amongst the Senate: howbeit the common people made open shewe of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his nephew, and one Seruius, who vpon confidence of his fauor, presented themselues to sue for certaine offices. And besides the shame of this refusall, to spighte him the more, they chose others in their steades, whose honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely dissembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying that by his meanes the people of ROME enioyed a full and perfect libertie, that in such cases of election they might freely doe what themselues listed. And to mitigate somewhat the peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuse Lucius Cinna Consull, who was of a contrary faction to him: hauing first bound him by solemne oth and curse to fauor his doings and whole procedings. Wherupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a stone in his hand, did solemnly sweare and promise, that he would be Syllaes faithfull friend: beseeching the gods if he did the contrary, that he might be throwen out of ROME, euen as he threw that stone out of his hand: & with those words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithstanding all these curses, Cinna was no sooner entred into his consulship, but presently he beganne to change and alter all. For amongst other things, he would needs haue Sylla accused: and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his iudges, and went to make warres against Mithridates. And it is sayed, that about the time that Sylla tooke ship, and departed out of ITALIE: there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods vnto king Mithridates, who was at that present in the cittie of PERGAMVM, as amongst others, that the PERGAMENIANS to honor Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victory, carying a garland of triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: so soone as she was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middest of the Theater, and burst all to peeces. Wherby all the people that were present, were stricken with a maruellous feare, and Mithridates himselfe began to mislike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately, then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA frō the ROMAINES, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the kings which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the city of PERGAMVM, to deuide the riches and great territories among his friends. As touching his sonnes: the eldest was of the realme of Pontus, and of BOSPHORVS, which he inherited from his predecessors, euen vnto the desertes beyond the marisses of Mæotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great army in conquering of THRACIA, and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenantes moreouer, did many notable conquestes in diuerse places, with a great power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and master of all the sea, for the great number of shippes he had, conquered the Iles CYCLADES, and all those beyond the hed of Malea, and specially amongst others the Ile of EVBŒA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GRECE to rebell, euen vnto THESSALIE, hauing that he receiued some losse by the city of CHÆRONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenantes of Sentius gouernor of MACEDON (a man of great wisdome and valiantnesse) came against him, and stayed him for going any further, ouerrunning the whole countrie of BOEOTIA like a furious raging riuer. And setting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHÆRONEA, ouerthrewe him in three seuerall battels: repulsed, and enforced him to take the seaes againe. Now as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commandement to giue place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge & commissiō in that behalfe giuen him. Wherupon Brutius Sura went out of the country of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his generall Sentius: notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could haue wished, and that all GRECE were very willing to reuolt, for the reputation of his wisdom and goodnes. Howbeit the things that we before haue spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those partes. Sylla now vpon his arriuall, recouered immediatly all the other citties of GRECE: who being aduertised of his comming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of ATHENS onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Aristion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, besieged the hauen of Piræa round, causing it to be battered and assaulted on euery side, with all sortes of engines and instrumentes of battery: whereas if he could haue had patience but a litle longer, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting himselfe in any manner of daunger, the same being brought to such extreame dearth and scarsity of all kind of victuals. But the hast that he made to returne againe to ROME, for feare of the new chaunge which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that sorte with great danger, many battelles, and infinite charge: considering also that besides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thousand mules and mulets labouring daily to furnish his engines of battery. And when all other wood failed him, because his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of themselues by reason of their waight, others consumed with fire throwen from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, then any other parke of pleasure in all the suburbes of the city, & feld down all the wood of the parke Lycæum. And standing in neede of a great summe of money to entertaine his warres withall, he delt also with the holiest temples of all GREECE, causing thē to bring him from the temples of EPIDAVRVM & OLYMPVS, all the richest & most pretious iewels they had. He wrote moreouer vnto the councell of the AMPHICTYONS holdē in the city of DELPHES, to bring him the ready money they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, thē if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to vse it, he would restore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis PHOCIAN, one of his very friends & familiars, and cōmanded him to wey all that he tooke. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in presence of the councell of the AMPHICTYONS, he wept, that the teares ran downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to doe such an act against his will. And when some that were present, told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes citheren in the temple: whether he beleued it was so indeed, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he marueiled he could not consider, that singing and playing on the citheren, were tokens rather of ioy then of anger: and therfore that he should not faile to proceede farther, and bring him the things which he commanded, for that (sayed he) Apollo did giue them him. Now for the iewels of the temple of Apollo, the cōmon people knew not that they were sent vnto Sylla: the siluer tunne, which only was that that remained of the offrings of the kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in peeces, because it was so great & massie, that the beasts draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other excellent ROMAINE captains, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus AEmilius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of GREECE, and the rest also hauing ouerthrowen the kings of MACEDON, they neuer once touched the gold and siluer of the temples of Greece, but contrarily sent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honor and reuerence. And as to them, they were all Captaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their souldiers well trained, & obedient at commandement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutiny. And for themselues, were kings in greatnes of courage and magnanimitie of mind: but in expences of their persons, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but needfull and necessary, proportioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the Captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, sought not their preferment in the commonwealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with another, then with strangers their enemies: were compelled to flatter their souldiers whom they should command, and to buy their paines & seruice, feeding them still with large & great expences, to please & content them. Wherein they did not consider, that they brought their country into bondage & made themselues slaues of the vilest people of the world, whilst that in the meane time they sought to commaund by all meanes possible those, which in many respects were farre better then themselues. And this was the cause that both draue Marius out of ROME, and made ason, and giuing the souldiers largely that serued vnder him, to winne their good wils the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason wherof, Sylla had neede of mountaines of moy, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make strangers traitors, and besides, to nish and satisfie his owne dissolute souldiers. For he had such an earnest desire to take the ce of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be disswaded from it. And either it was of a certain ore ambition he had to fight against the auncient reputation of that citie, being then but a low to that it had bene: or else of a very anger, for the mockes & gibes which the tirant A- d greatest imperfections of king Mithridates, & heaped them wholly together in himselfe: reason whereof the poore city of ATHENS which had escaped from so many warres, tynies, and ciuill dissentions vntill that present time, was by him, as by an vncurable disease, rought vnto all extremitie. For a bushell of wheate was worth a thousande Drachmas, and en were driuen for famine to eate feuerfew that grew about the castle: and they caused olde es and old oyle pots to be sodden, to deliuer some sauor vnto that they did eate, whilest the rant himselfe did nothing all day long but cramme in meat, & drinke dronke, dance, maske, ke & flout at the enemies, suffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane season to goe for lacke of oyle. And when the Nunne of the same temple sent vnto him for a quarter of a shell of wheate, he sent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellers of the ie the priests & religious came to the castle, holding vp their hands, and beseeching him to e some pitie of the citie, and fall to composition with Sylla: he made them to be driuen away d scattered with slings. In the end, very late, and yet with great a do, he sent two or three of s quaffing companions vnto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demaund of mposition for the towne, but began to praise & magnifie the deeds of Theseus, of Eumolpus, & the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made the this answere. My good-orators, returne you againe with all your rethoricke: for the ROMAINES sent me not hier to learne nor to studie, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. the meane time there were certaine spies in the citie that heard old men talking together in place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant because he kept no better watch on that side of the ll that was directly ouer against the Heptachalcon, which was the onely place where the emies might easilliest get vp vpon the wals. Those spies went straight vnto Sylla, and told him t they had heard the old men say. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night self: and perceiuing that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And himselfe The great valiantnesse of Marcus Teius.

es in his commentaries, that the first man that scaled the wals, was Marcus Teius: who fina souldier readie to resist him, gaue him such a sore blow with his sword vpon his head-e, that his sworde brake in two, and yet notwithstanding that he saw himselfe naked and armed of a sword, did not for all that giue backe, but stood still to it, & kept the place so long through him the city was taken, and all vpon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the Athens taken by Sylla. ll to be pulled down betwene the hauen of Piræa, & the holy hauen: & hauing before made breach very plaine, entred into the citie about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, sing a maruellous noise with a number of hornes, & sounding of trumpets, & all his armie him in order of battell, crying, to the sacke, to the sacke: kill, kill. For he had giuen them owne in spoile, & to put all to the sword. The souldiers therfore ran through the streetes their swords drawen, making an vncredible slaughter: so that to this day they be not ac-wed, nor do not declare what number of persons were slaine, but to shew the greatnes of murther that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the bloud ran. The slaughter of the Athenians after the taking of the citie.
Besides them that were slaine through all the city, the bloud of them only that were slaine e market steede, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Di-ia: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbes of the citie. But if the mul-de of the people that were slaine in this sort were great, much more (or so many at the
) it is said were those that slew themselues, for the sorrow and compassion they had to see their country in such pitifull state, supposing certainly that their citie was now come to ruine and destruction. This opinion made the noblest men of the citie to despaire of their safetie, and feared to liue any longer, because they thought they should finde no mercie moderation of crueltie in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requestes of Midias Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, & fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees partly also at the requestes of the ROMAINE Senators that were in his campe, who pr him to pardon the bodie of the citie, and the rather for that he had alreadie quenched the of his rauening minde sufficiently well, after that he had somewhat saide in praise of the cient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to giue the greater number vnto the smaller the liuing to the dead. Sylla writeth himselfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the ATHENS on the very selfe day of the calendes of march, which commeth to agree wi their enemies, against Archelaus minde, brought out their bandes into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horsemen, with cartes, with shieldes and targets, so that the aire was euen cut a sunder as it were with the violence of the noise and cries of so many sundrie nations, which altogether did put themselues in battell ray. The sumptuousnes of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether superfluous and vnprofitable, but serued greatly to feare the beholders. For the glistering of their harnesse, so richly trimmed and set foorth with gold and siluer, the colours of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the fashion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright glistering steele and shining copper, made such a shew as they went and remoued to and fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had been on a very fire, a fearefull thing to looke vpon. Insomuch as the ROMAINES durst not so much as once goe out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perswasion could driue away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore, (and because also he would not compell them to goe forth in this feare) he was driuen not to stirre, but close to abide (though it grieued him greatly) to see the barbarous people so proudly and villainously laugh him and his men to scorne. Howbeit the disdaine and scoffing of his enemies, stood him to great good purpose afterwards. For they making now none account of him, kept small watch and ward, ranged vp and downe disorderly besides, though otherwise they were not very obedient vnto their Captaines, being many commaunders, and fewe good followers: by reason whereof, a small number kept in the campe, and all the rest of the great multitude intised with the gaine they made by spoyling and sacking of townes thereabouts, dispersed themselues many daies iourney from their campe. For it is saide, that at that very time they destroyed the citie of PANOPEIA, sacked the citie of LEBADIA, and spoyled the temple without commaundement or licence of any of all their Captaines to doe it. In the meane while, Sylla seeing so many cities and townes spoyled and destroyed, tooke it both grieuously, and also angrily: howbeit he suffered not his men to lie idlely, but kept them in labour, to turne the course of the riuer of Cephisus, and to cast great trenches, not suffering any man to take ease or rest, but continually with great seuerity punished such as went faintly and lasely to worke, to the ende that being wearied with the paine they tooke after so many workes, they would rather proue to fight a hard battell, as it fell out in deede. For the third day after they had begunne thus to labour, as he had passed by them, they cried out vnto him to lead them against their enemies. But his answere was vnto them againe: that those were but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then desirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be so in deede, and that you haue so good a will to fight as you make shew of: then I will, said he, that you arme your selues presently, and get you to yonder place, shewing them therewithall where the castle of the PARAPOTAMIANS stood in old time, which then (the citie being destroyed) was no more but the toppe of a stony mountaine cut all about, and seuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Assus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the same mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephisus, and both these riuers running in one, carying a swift streame, doe make the knappe of the said hill very strong of situation to lodge a campe vpon. And therefore Sylla seeing the souldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to get vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as in deede he did) marched thither in all hast possible, & got it euen with the earnest good will of all his souldiers. Archelaus being so repulsed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHÆRONEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHÆRONEANS that were in Syllaes campe, besought him that he would not forsake their citie, and leaue it to their enemy. Sylla desiring to gratifie them therein, sent one of his Colonels Gabinius with a legion, and therewithall gaue the CHÆRONEANS leaue to goe thither, who did what they could possible to get into the citie before Gabinius: but that they could not, such was the diligence and honestie of the man, as he seemed more desirous of their safetie, then they were themselues. Neuertheless, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was sent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was our citie of CHÆRONEA preserued from the daunger it stood in at that time. In the meane time came very good prophecies to the ROMAINES, both of oracles & prophecies, which promised them victory from the temple of LEBADIA, and the caue of Trophonius: of which prophecies, those country men make great mention. But Sylla in his tenth booke of his commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius, a man of qualitie and name amongst them that trafficked into the country of Greece, came vnto him after he had won the battell of CHÆRONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gaue him to vnderstand, that shortly after he should haue a second battell, and that he should yet gaine haue an other victory in the same place. After him an other man of warre called Saluenius, told him also what successe he should haue in the warres of ITALIE, saying, that he knew it by reuelation: and both these men agreed in the manner of the reuelation. For they said, that they had seene a god, in maiestie, beautie, and greatnesse, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympias. Sylla hauing passed the riuer of Assus, went to lodge at the foote of mount Edylium, fast by Archelaus, who had placed and fortified his campe betweene the two mountaines of Acontium, and of Edylium, ioyning to the citie of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his owne name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Murena in his campe with a legion, and two cohortes, to keepe the enemies still occupied that were in great trouble, and he himselfe in the meane time went and sacrificed by the riuer of Cephisus. His sacrifice being ended, he marched towards the citie of CHÆRONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountaine also called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knappe of a mountaine very steepe and sharpe of all sides, with a narrow point like a pine apple, by reason whereof we doe call it Orthopagium. At the foote of the same runneth the riuer called Morion, and there is also the temple of Apollo surnamed Thurias: and they say that this surname of Thurias was giuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Cheron, the founder and builder of the citie of CHÆRONEA. Other thinke that the cow which was giuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in the place: which hath euer since kept the name, for that the PHENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neere vnto CHÆRONEA, the Colonell Gabinius whom he had sent thither with a garrison to defend the same, went to meete him with his men very wel armed, wearing a laurell garland: and Sylla after he had saluted him, and his souldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their dutie in fighting. And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHÆRONEA to him, one his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaximus, who promised him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but giue them some smal number of souldiers. For there was a litle path way, which the barbarous people mistrusted not, beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muses, by the which they might easily go to the toppe of this mountaine Thurium: so that following that pathe, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, and they might easily kill them with stones, or at the least they should driue them mawgre their heads downe into the valley. Gabinius assuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and such as he might boldly trust vnto, Sylla gaue them men, and commaunded them to execute their enterprise: and he himselfe in the meane season went and set his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horsemen on the wings, placed himselfe in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Murena. Galba and Hortensius his Lieutenantes, were placed in the taile with certaine bandes of the reregard which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies should not inclose them behinde: because they perceiued a farre off that the enemies purposed a great number of horsemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to the end that the points of their battell might the more easily bowe and enlarge themselues, to compasse in the ROMAINES on the backe side. Now in the meane time, these two CHÆRONEIANS whom Sylla had sent vnder Hireius their Captaine, hauing compassed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them: sodainely came to shew themselues vpon the toppe of the mountaine, which did so feare the barbarous people, that they began immediatly to flie: one of them for the most part killing an other. There was no resistance, but flying downe the mountaine, fell vpon the points of their owne partisans and pikes, and one of them thrusting in an others necke, tumbled headlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behind where they lay open vnto them: so as they were slaine a three thousand of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that sought to saue themselues by flight, Murena that was alreadie set in battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slew them downe right. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footemen, put the most part of them quite out of order, & maruellously troubled their Captaines before they could set them againe in order: which was one of the chiefest causes of their ouerthrowe. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vpon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly wonne the ground that was betweene both armies, wherby he tooke away the force of all their armed cartes with sythes, which are then of greatest force, when they haue the longest course, to giue them a swift and violent stroke in their chase: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker and of lesse strength, euen as arrowes are that a farre off enter not deepe into the thing they be shot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their first cartes set forth so faintly, and came on with so feeble a force, that the ROMAINES sent them backe, & easily repulsed them, with great slaughter and clapping of handes one to an other, as they commonly vse in the ordinarie games of horse-running at ROME. When they had thus repulsed the cartes, the battell of Syllaes footemen beganne to charge the barbarous people, who basing their pikes, stoode close one to an other because they would not be taken: and the ROMAINES on the other side bestowed first their darts among them, and then sodainely drewe out their swordes in the heat they were in, and put a side the enemies pikes, wherby they might come neerer to their bodies. There were fiftene thousand slaues in the front of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open proclamation; and had deuided them by bandes amongst the other footemen. By occasion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion spake pleasantly at that time, saying, that he neuer saw slaues before haue libertie to speake and doe like free men, but only at Saturnes feastes. Nenertheless, they against the nature of slaues, were very valiant to abide the shocke, and the ROMAINE footemen could not so readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them giue backe, because they stoode very close one to an other, and their rankes were of such a length besides: vntill such time as the ROMAINES that were behinde the first rankes, did so pelt them with their slings, hurling stones, bestowing their darts and arrowes vpon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backes, & flie a maine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his armie, supposing to enclose the ROMAINES behinde. Hortensius straightwaies caused the bands he had with him to run & charge vpon the flankes. Which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horsemen he had about him turne their faces forthwith, which were in number about two thousand: insomuch as Hortensius being set vppon with all his troupe, was compelled to retire by little and little towardes the mountaine, perceiuing himselfe farre from the battell of his footemen, and enuironned round about with his enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speede returned againe towardes the right wing of his enemies from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to commaund them. Taxiles on the other side, caused his copper targets also to march against Murena: so as the noise they made on both sides, caused the mountains to ring againe, wherwithall Sylla staied, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resolued to returne to the place frō whence he came, & sent Hortensius with foure ensignes to aide Murena: and himselfe with the fifth in great speed went towards the right wing of his armie, the which was now already bickering, and ioyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did easily distresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them flying for life to the riuer, & vnto the mountaine Aconitum. But Sylla notwithstanding forgate not Murena, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that hoon his side had also put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chase of them that fled. There was a maruellous slaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them supposing to haue recouered their campe, were slaine by the way: so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped onely tenne thousand, who saued themselues by flying vnto the citie of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckoning of no more but fourteene of his ſouldiers onely that were ſlaine, whereof there came two againe to him the ſame night. Wherefore in the markes of triumph which he ſet vp for tokens of that victory, he cauſed to be written on the toppe thereof, Mars, victorie, and Venus: ſignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in theſe warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall diſcipline. Theſe markes of triumph were ſet vp for the battell which he wanne in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he ſet vp an other alſo in the toppe of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were ſet vpon behinde: and there is written in Greeke letters, that the valiant deedes of Omolichus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victory. Sylla for the ioy of this great won battell, cauſed muſitians to play in the citie of THEBES, where he builded a ſtage for all the muſitians, neere vnto the fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GRECIANS were appointed iudges of that muſicke, whom he cauſed to be ſent for out of other cities, becauſe he mortally hated the THEBANS: inſomuch as he tooke from them halfe their lands, which he conſecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue thereof they ſhould redeliuer and pay backe the money which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was choſen Conſull at ROME, and had paſſed the ſea Ionium with an armie, vnder pretext to make warre againſt king Mithridates, but indeede to make warre with himſelfe: tooke his iorney towards THESSALIE to meete him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newes him out of all partes, that there was a new and ſecond armie of the kings arriued, no leſſe then the firſt, the which ſpoiled and deſtroyed all the country which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenants, was arriued in the citie of CHALCIDI with a great fleete of ſhips, hauing brought thither with him foure ſcore thouſande fighting men, the beſt trained, the beſt armed and appointed ſouldiers that were in all his kingdom of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that country at commandement, and ſought to fight with Sylla, notwithſtanding that Archelaus alleaged many reaſons to diſwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that ſo many thouſandes of ſouldiers could not haue beene caſt away in the firſt battell, without ſome notable treaſon. Whereupon Sylla returned with all poſſible ſpeede, & made Dorylaus know before many days paſſed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wiſe man, and knew well enough the worthineſſe of valiant courage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus hauing had but a litle proofe only in certaine light skirmiſhes which he made againſt Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALY: himſelfe was the firſt that could ſay then, it was not for them to hazard battell, but rather to draw out the warre in length, and ſupplant the ROMAINES with charge and expence. And yet notwithſtanding, the cõmodity of the great large plaine that lieth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to giue battell in, ſpecially becauſe he was the ſtronger of horſemen in the field. For of all the plaines that are within the country of BOEOTIA, the greateſt & largeſt of thẽ, is the plaine neere to the citie of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the mariſſes where the riuer of Melas diſperſeth it ſelfe abroad. The head of the ſame riuer is not farre from the city of ORCHOMENE, & that riuer only of all other riuers in GREECE from the very head whence it commeth, is nauigable: and hath beſides an other ſingular property, for it riſeth & ſwelleth euen in the longeſt ſommer daies, as the riuer of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the ſelfe ſame plants and trees, ſauing that they beare no frute, neither are they ſo great as thoſe of Ægypt. This riuer hath no long courſe, becauſe that the moſt part of the water runneth into lakes and mariſſes, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very ſmall part of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, in the place where the reedes grow that make good flutes withal. When they were camped one neere to another, Archelaus lay quietly & ſtirred not. But Sylla preſently caſt great trenches from one ſide to another, to ſtoppe the way againſt their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, and haue driuen the ROMAINES into the mariſſes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, ſo ſoone as their Captaines had giuen them liberty, diſcharged with ſuch a fury, that they did not only ſcatter

that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the moſt part of their gard alſo that ſtood in battell ray to defend them, in a maruellous feare, who alſo began to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted ſtraight from his horſe, and taking an enſigne in his hand, ran through the middeſt of his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, ſayd vnto them: O my ROMAINE ſouldiers, mine honour commandeth me to dye here, and therefore when any man aſketh you where you forſooke your Captaine, remēber that you anſwere, it was at ORCHOMENE. They were ſo aſhamed at theſe wordes, that he made them turne: beſides that, there came two cohortes vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue ſuch a hot charge vpon their enemies, that they fled forthwith vpon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine: and thereupon by and by ſet them againe to the trenches to encloſe his enemies camp, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues ſonne ſlaine, fighting valiantly before them all in the right wing of their battell. And the bow-men being preſſed ſo neare by the ROMAINES, that their bowes would do no good: tooke their arrowes in their handes in ſtead of ſwordes, and ſtake their enemies with them to force them to giue backe, vntill ſuch time as at the laſt they were all driuen into their camp, where they paſſed that night in great ſorrow, as well for the loſſe of them that were ſlaine, as alſo for the number of thoſe that were hurt. The next, morning, Sylla leading his men againe towardes the camp of his enemies, went on ſtill continuing his trenches: & certaine of them being come out to skirmiſh with them, he ſet vpon them ſo luſtely, that at the firſt charge he put them to flight. That brought ſuch a feare to all the whole camp of the enemies, that not a man durſt abide any longer: ſo as Sylla valiantly following on his victory, ſhuffled in among them as they fled, and in the end tooke all together. Straight way all the mariſſes were filled with bloud, and the lake full of dead bodies: ſo that vntill this preſent day they finde there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people, morians, peeces of taſſes, and ſwordes drowned in the mudde of the mariſſes, notwithſtanding that it is well neare two hundred yeares a go ſince this battell was ſtriken. And thus much for the warres about the cities of CHÆRONEA, & ORCHOMENE. Now the warres being paſt in this ſorte in GREECE, Cinna, and Carbo delt very cruelly and vnnaturally at ROME with the noble men and greateſt perſons: by reaſon whereof, many flying their tyranny, went to Syllaes camp, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulneſſe of felicity, ſo that in ſhort time Sylla had an aſſembly of a ROMAINE Senate about him. Metella her ſelfe, his wife, hauing ſtolen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houſes in the citie and country both were all burnt & deſtroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go and helpe them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla vpon hearing of theſe newes, fell in great perplexitie. For on the one ſide, it grieued him to ſee his country ſo miſerably afflicted: and on the other ſide he knew not well how he might go, leauing ſo great an enterpriſe as that warre was, and eſpecially againſt a king of ſuch might and power as Mithridates ſhewed himſelfe to be. And being in theſe dumpes, there came one Archelaus a marchant to him, borne in the city of DELIVM, who brought him a ſecret meſſage from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleaſed Sylla ſo well, that he deſired that Archelaus and himſelfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the ſea ſide, neare vnto the city of DELIVM, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto Sylla that he would wiſh him to leaue the conqueſt of ASIA, and of the realme of PONT, & returne into his countrey to the ciuill warres at ROME: and in ſo doing, the king would furniſh him, not onely with as much money, but with as many ſhippes and men, as he himſelfe would deſire. Sylla vpon this motion told him againe that he would wiſh him to forſake Mithridates ſeruice, and to make himſelfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES; ſo that he would deliuer him all his nauie which then he had in his power. Archelaus ſeemed much to abhorre to heare him ſpeake of treaſon. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him; why Archelaus, ſayd he, thou that art a CAPPADOCIAN and ſeruant to a barbarous king, or his friend at the leaſt: haſt thou ſo good a hart with thee, that for all the benefites I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act? Syllaes victory of Mithridates Lieutenaunts at Orchomene.

Sylla ouercame Archelaus in two famous battels at Cheronea and at Orchomene.

and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the battell of CHÆRONEA dideſt ſaue thy ſelfe by flying, with a ſmall number left thee of ſix ſcore thouſand fighting men, which thou before haddeſt in thy camp: and that hid thy ſelfe two dayes together in the mariſſes of ORCHOMENA, leauing the fields of BŒOTIA with ſuch heapes of dead bodies, that no man could paſſe for them. After this reply, Archelaus altered his ſpeech, and falling downe at Syllaes feete, humbly beſought him to end this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla anſwered, that he was very well contented withall. And therupon peace was concluded betweene them vnder conditions: that Mithridates ſhould depart from ASIA the leſſe, and from PAPHLAGONIA, that he ſhould reſtore BITHYNIA vnto Nicomedes, & CAPPADOCIA vnto Ariobarzanes, that he ſhould pay two thouſand talents to the ROMAINES, and giue them three ſcore & ten gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon this, Sylla would alſo aſſure him the reſt of his realme: and would cauſe him to be proclaimed a friend of the ROMAINES. These articles being paſt by agreemẽt betwixt them, Sylla taking his iourney through THESSALIE and MACEDON into the countrey of HELLESPONT, caried Archelaus with him, whõ he honorably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerouſly ſicke of a diſeaſe in the city of LARISSA he ſtayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefeſt Captaines and companions. And this was the cauſe that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHÆRONIA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treaſon. And againe, Archelaus was the more ſuſpected, becauſe Sylla redelyuered Mithridates all his ſeruants and friends which he had priſoners, ſauing the tyrant Ariſtion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyſoned, becauſe he was Archelaus enemie: but ſpecially, for landes Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him ten thouſand Iugera, (or acres of land) within the Ile of EVBOEA, and gaue him moreouer the title of a friend of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denieth all theſe things in his commentaries. In the meane time Ambaſſadours came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their maſter did ratifie and accept all the articles of peace, ſauing that he onely prayed him he would not take the country of PAPHLAGONIA from him: & as for the gallies, he would not ſo much as once ſay he would promiſe them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly anſwered them againe. Then Mithridates, as ye ſay, meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA ſtill, and refuſeth to giue the ſhippes I demanded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put ſo many ROMANE citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me an other tale, if I come once into ASIA: but now at PERGAMVM, he ſpeaketh his pleaſure of this warre which he hath not ſeene. The Ambaſſadours being afrayed of his words, replyed not againe. Whereupon Archelaus ſpake, and beſought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreaty in the end he obtained of Sylla to ſend him vnto Mithridates: promiſing that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he would not, he would kill himſelfe with his owne handes. Vpon this promiſe Sylla ſent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the country of MEDICA: and after he had deſtroyed the moſt part thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus hauing returned from Mithridates, found him neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing newes that all ſhould be well, howbeit that his maiſter Mithridates prayed him he might ſpeake with him in any caſe. Now, the matter that made Mithridates ſo earneſt to ſpeake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who hauing ſlaine Flaccus the Conſull, being of the contrary faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants alſo, went himſelfe againſt him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, choſe rather to make himſelfe Sylla friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the country of TROADE, in the city of DARDANE: Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred ſaile of ſhippes with oares at ſea, with twenty thouſand footemen, ſixe thouſand horſe, and a number of armed carres with ſythes beſides by land, Sylla hauing onely but foure enſignes of footemen, and two hundred horſemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla ſtayed him firſt, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vpon. Mithridates made him no anſwere. Sylla following on his tale, ſayd vnto him. It is for [illegible]

ſpeake firſt, that haue requeſt to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will ſay. Then began Mithridates to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the occaſion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinaunce of the gods that ſo had appointed it, and partly alſo vpon the ROMAINES themſelues. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, ſeeing he lacked no comely words to cloke his foule and ſhamefull deedes, but withall he ſharpely vpbraided him, and draue him to confeſſe the cruelties he had committed. And afterwardes asked him againe, if he did count it meete that which Archelaus had done, Mithridates made anſwere that he did. Then Sylla ſaluted, embraced, and kiſſed him, and calling for the kings Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend alſo. In concluſion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three ſcore and ten gallies, and a hundred bowmen, he returned by ſea into his realme of PONTVS. But Sylla hearing that his ſouldiers were angry with his peace made with Mithridates, becauſe they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their moſt cruell and mortall enemy, (hauing in one ſelfe day cauſed a hundred and fifty thouſand ROMANE citizens to be ſlaine, that were diſperſed abroad in diuers places of ASIA) ſo to depart, and go his way ſafe, with the riches and ſpoyles of the countrey, which he had bereft them of, and vſed at his pleaſure, the ſpace of foure yeares together: anſwered them in excuſe of himſelfe, that he was not able to make warre with Mithridates & Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together againſt him. And ſo Sylla departing thence, went againſt Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the citie of THYATIRA, and lodged himſelfe as neare vnto him as he conueniently might. Now whileſt he was compaſſing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbrias ſouldiers came out of their camp in their coates without any armour or weapon, to ſalute Syllaes ſouldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their trench. Which Fimbria ſeeing, and perceiuing his ſouldiers mindes ſo changed, of an extreme feare which he had of Sylla, at whoſe handes he looked for no mercy, killed himſelfe in his owne camp. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole country of Aſia to the ſelfe, to pay the ſumme of twenty thouſand talents amongeſt them, and preſently gaue order did many poore houſholders through his inſolent ſouldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garriſon there. For he ordained that euery houſholder ſhould giue the ſouldier that lodged in his houſe foure Tetradrachmas a day, and ſhould be bound to giue him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their ſupper alſo: and that euery Captaine ſhould haue fifty Drachmas a day, a night gowne for the houſe, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had giuen this order, he departed from the city of EPHESVS with all his fleete, and in three dayes ſayling arriued in the hauen of Pirea at ATHENS, where he was receiued into the fraternity of the myſteries, and required for himſelfe the Librarie of Apellicon Teian, in the which were the moſt part of Ariſtotles and Theophraſtus workes, not then thought meete to come in euery mans handes. And they ſay, that this Librarie being brought to ROME, Tyrannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN hauing recouered the originals into his hands, put them in print, and wrote the ſummaries which we haue at this preſent. For the ancient Peripareticke Philoſophers were of themſelues very wiſe and learned men, but they had not all Ariſtotles workes, nor Theophraſtus amongeſt them, & yet thoſe few they had, were not by them ſeene all whole and perfect together: becauſe that the bookes of Neleus SCEPSIAN (to whom Theophraſtus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and eſtimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS had ſuch a paine and numneſſe in his legges, and was ſo gouty withall, that Strabo calleth it a ſpice of the goute, that is to ſay, a feeling or entring thereof, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occaſion he tooke the ſea, and went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hot bathes: and there remained a while ſolacing himſelfe all the day long with muſicke, ſeeing of playes, and entertaining ſuch kinde of people. Vpon a day as he was walking by the ſea ſide, certaine fiſher men made him a preſent of fiſh, which pleaſed him maruellous well, & demanding of them whence they were: they anſwered him againe, that they were of the citie of ALES. Sylla went to the bathes at Adipſum for the goute in his legges.

sayd he: is there any of them yet left aliue? speaking it, because that after the battell of Orchomene when he followed the chase of his enemies, he had taken and destroyed three cities of Boeotia all at one selfe time, to wit Anthedon, Larymna, and Ales. The poore silher men were so amazed with these words, that they stood still, & could not tell what to say. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their wayes a Gods name, and be not afraid: for they brought no small intercessours with them, which were worth the reckening of VVhen Sylla had giuen them these wordes, the Aleians went home with a merry hart, to gather themselues together againe in the city. Sylla so passing through Thessalia & Macedonia came to the sea side, intending to go frō the city of Dyrrachium vnto Brundusium, twelue hundred saile. The city of Apollonia is hard by Dyrrachium, and there about is a parke consecrated vnto the nymphes, where in a fayre goodly greene meadow in many places there commeth out great bubbles of fire that flame continually: and it is sayd that there was a Satyre taken sleeping, euen in the very selfe same forme the painters and image-makers haue set him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all sortes of interpreters what he was, he made no answere that a man could vnderstand: but onely put forth a sharpe voyce like the neying of a horse, or whynnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to passe the sea, he was afrayed that so soone as they were landed in Italie they would shrinke from him, and euery man go home to his owne. But they sware and promised first of themselues, that they would tary and keepe together, and by their willes would not be hurt in Italie. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in neede of money, they offred him all theirs, and euery man to lend him as his ability serued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant souldiers, he went gainst fifteen generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fifty ensignes of footemen well armed, as he himselfe writeth in his commentaries. But the gods promised him good fortune in his warres, by many sundry apparant signes. For in a sacrifice he made by Tarentum, after he was come a land, the liuer of a certaine beast sacrificed, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a crown or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang red bands or rolles. And a litle before he went into Campania, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuertheless was no matter of truth, but a vision onely that appeared, and rising from the earth dispersed it selfe by litle and litle here and there in the aire, and in the end vanished quite away, as cloudes which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowen by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had appointed any man his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely vpon the contempt and life of his souldiers, whose good will to serue against them was such, as following the victory, he compelled the Consull Norbanus after he had slaine six thousand of his men, to take the citie of Capua for his refuge. This noble exploit, (as himselfe reported) was cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he saith furthermore, that in the city of Sylvium, there was a slaue of one Pontius a citizen, who being inspired with a propheticall spirit, came to tell him from the goddesse Bellona, that she should grow in strength, and cary away the victory of these warres: howbeit that if he did hye him the sooner, the Capitoll at Rome should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the sixteenth day of the month called Quintilis, & now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neare vnto the city of Fidentia with sixteen ensignes onely, against fifty ensignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, because the most part of them were naked and vnarmed, was about to hazard the battell: & as he was euen bethinking himselfe what was best to determine of, there rose a litle wind out of a goodly meadow that blew a wonderfull sort of flowers vpon the souldiers on euery part of them. These flowers stayed of themselues as they fell some vpon their targets, and others vpon their moryans, without falling to the ground.

that it seemed to their enemies a farre off, as if they had bene garlands of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus souldiers more lusty a great deale then they were before, and with this good will they determined to giue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, slue eighteen thousand of them in the field, and tooke their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates, & Tigranes. Neuertheles, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vse policy with force: & therefore practised with Scipio one of the Consuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: & thereupon were oft meetings & assemblies of both sides. Now Sylla draue off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasion of delay, to the end that his souldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft and subtilty as well as himselfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes souldiers by resort into his camp: for they comming into Scipioes camp, being very conuersant with them, straight corrupted some of them with ready money, other with promises, & other with fayre flattering wordes, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practise had continued a while, Sylla comming neare vnto Scipioes camp with twenty ensignes only: all his men saluted Scipioes souldiers, & they resaluting them againe, yeelded themselues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was left post alone in his tente where he was taken, but they afterwardes let him go. So Sylla with his twenty ensignes, like vnto the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birdes into their nets, hauing gotten forty ensignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his camp. There it was that Carbo sayd of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe, and a lyon both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and mischiefe then the lyon. After this, Marius the younger hauing fourescore and fiue ensignes in his camp neare vnto the citie of Signium, presented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good desire to fight, and specially on that day, because the night before he had seene this vision in his dreame, that he thought he saw Marius the father (who was deceased long before) warning his sonne that he should come to him. Sylla for this respect desired maruellously to fight that day: and thereupon caused Dolabella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies stept between him and home, and stopped his passage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes souldiers to the contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with so great labour and paine, that they were all wearie and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great shower of raine vpon them as they were busie, opening the way, that troubled them more, then the labour they had in hand. Whereupon the priuate Captaines of the bandes went to make Sylla vnderstand it, and to pray him to deferre the battell vntill an other day: shewing him how the souldiers wearied with labour, lay downe vpon their targets on the ground to take their ease. Sylla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly indeede against his will. But when he had giuen the signall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their camp: Marius the yonger commeth a horse backe marching brauely before all his companie, hoping to haue surprised his enemies in disorder, & by that meanes to haue ouerthrowen them easily. But farre otherwise did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his foresayd dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, stucke their dartes vpon the bancke, ranne vpon their enemies with their swordes drawen, and with a maruellous crie set vpon them so valiantly, that they were not able to resist their furie, but sodainly turned their backes and fled, where there was a great and notable slaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the citie of PRÆNESTE, where he found the gates shut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and so was triced vp by it. Yet some writers say, and Fenestella among other, that Marius neuer saw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and verie sleepie, he lay vnder some tree in the shadow to rest a litle, after he had giuen the signall and word of the battell, and slept so soundlie, that he could scant awake with the noise and fleeing of his men. Sylla himselfe writeth, that he lost at this battell but three and twentie men, slue twentie thousand of his enemies, and tooke eight thousand prisoners. His lieutenants also had the like good successe in other places, Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and others: which without any losse of their men, or but with a very small, ouerthrew many great mightie armies of their enemies. In ſomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrarie faction, and he that moſt maintained it, fled one night out of his camp, and went beyond the ſeas into AFRICKE. The laſt battell that Sylla had, was againſt Theleſinus SAMNYTE, who comming like a freſh champion to ſet vpon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battels, had almoſt ſlaine him euen at ROME gates. For Theleſinus hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers with one Lamponius LVCANE, marched with all ſpeed towardes the city of PRÆNESTE, to deliuer Marius the younger that was beſieged there. But vnderſtanding that Sylla on the one ſide, came in great haſt alſo to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other ſide, and perceiuing moreouer that the way was ſo ſhut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backeward being a valiant ſouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fieldes, moſt dangerouſly ventured to go ſtraight to ROME. And ſo ſtale away by night with all his whole power, and marching to ROME ward, had almoſt taken it at his firſt comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he ſtayed happely ten furlonges from the gate Collina, bragging with himſelfe, and beleeuing that he ſhould do wonders, for that he had mocked ſo many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came diuers young noble men and gentlemen out of the citie to skirmiſh with Theleſinus: who ſlue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young gentleman of a noble houſe, and very honeſt. Whereupon (as you may eaſily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and ſpecially the women, who fell a ſhrecking and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had ſent) came firſt with ſeuen hundred horſe vpon the ſpurre, and ſtaying but a litle to coole and giue them breath, bridled ſtraight againe, and went to ſet vpon the enemies thereby to ſtay them. Soone after him came Sylla alſo, who commanded his men that came firſt, quickly to eate ſomwhat, and that done, put them ſtraight in battell ray: notwithſtanding that Dolobella and Torquatus perſwaded him to the contrary, and beſought him not to put his ſouldiers wearied with their iourney, to ſo great and manifeſt a danger, and the rather, becauſe they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNYTES and LVCANES, who were (both) warlike nations & good ſouldiers, and thoſe beſides that moſt deadly hated the ROMAINES. But for all that, Sylla draue them backe, and commanded his trumpets to ſound the alarome, being almoſt within foure houres of night: and this battell was ſharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Craſſus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very ſore diſtreſſed, and ſtood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courſer that was both ſwift, and very ſtrong. The enemies knew him, and there were two that lifted vp their armes to throw their dartes at him, whom he ſaw not: but his page gaue his horſe ſuch a lafh with his whippe, that he made him ſo to gird forward, as the very points of the dartes ſtuck hard by the horſe tayle, and ſtucke faſt in the ground. Some ſay that Sylla had a litle golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of DELPHES, and in time of warres wore alwayes in his boſome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kiſsing it, ſaid: O Apollo Pythian haſt thou ſo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, ſo fortunate hitherto through ſo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with ſhame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his owne naturall city among his country men? And ſo crying out to Apollo for helpe, thruſt into the preaſe among his men, intreating ſome, threatning others, and laying vpon the reſt to ſtay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his armie was broken and ouerthrowen by his enemies: and himſelfe amongeſt them that fled, was compelled to recoure his camp with ſpeede, hauing loſt many of his friendes and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens ſlaine and troden vnder feete (both with horſe and men) that came onely to ſee the battell fought: ſo that they within the citie thought themſelues vtterly vndone. Lucretius Oſfella furthermore (he that Beſieged Marius in the citie of PRÆNESTE) had almoſt raiſed his ſiege, vpon the wordes of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who willed him to remoue with all ſpeed poſsible, for Sylla was ſlaine, and Theleſinus had taken ROME. But about midnight came certaine ſouldiers from Craſſus to Syllaes camp, and asked for meate for Craſſus ſupper, and his mens, who hauing chaſed his flying enemies whom he had throwne, vnto the city of ANTEMNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderstanding that, and being aduertised that the most parte of his enemies were ouerthrowne at this battell, went himself the next morning betimes vnto ANTEMNA, where three thousand of his enemies sent to know if he would receiue them to mercy, if they yeelded themselues vnto him. His answer was, that he would pardon their liues, so as they would doe some mischiefe to their fellowes before they came to him. These three thousand hereupon truly to his promise, fell vpon their companions: and for the most part one of them killed an other. Notwithstanding, Sylla hauing gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as the rest, amounting in all to the number of six thousand men, within the shew-place where they vsed to run their horses: whilest he himselfe held a councell in the temple of the goddesse Bellona, and was making his oration there, he had appointed certaine to set vpon those six thousand, and put them to the sword euery man. Great & horrible were the cries of such a number of men slaine in so small a roome, as many may easily coniecture in so much as the Senators sitting in councell heard them very easily, and maruelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begun with a set steadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken what he said, and not to trouble themselues with any thing done abroade: for they were but certaine offenders and lewd persons that were punished by his commandement. This was enough to shew the simple ROMAINE in ROME, that they had but only changed the tyrant, but not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had bene euer of a churlish and seuere nature euen from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall stubbornesse. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modest and ciuil in all his prosperity, & gaue great good hope that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yet not withstanding the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth giuē to pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, and weepe for tender heart: in that he became after so cruell and bloody, the great alteration gaue manifest cause to condemne the increase of honour and authority, as the onely meanes whereby mens manners continue not such as they were at the first, but still do change and vary, making some fooles, others vaine and fantasticall, others extreame cruell and vnnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by chāging his state & condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shew it selfe, when the way of liberty was laide open: this matter is to be treated in some other treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fel to shedding of bloud, & filled all Rome with infinite & vnspeakable murthers: for diuers were killed for priuate quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffred his friends & those about him to worke their wicked wils. Vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should know that all the mischiefes were finished, the which they daily saw. For said he, we will not pray you to pardon life, where you haue threatned death: but only to put them out of doubt whom you haue determined to saue. Wherunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolued whom he would saue. Metellus replied, then tell vs quoth he, who they are that shall die. Sylla answered he would. Howbeit some say it was not Metellus, but Ausidius one of his flatterers, that spake this last word vnto him. Wherefore Sylla immediatly without making any of the Senate priuy, caused fourescore mens names to be set vp vpon posts, whom he would put to death. Euery man being offended withall, the next day following he set vp 220 mens names more: and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly that he had appointed all them to die, that he could call to remembrance: but that hereafter he would appoint them that should die by daies, as he did call them to mind. Whosoeuer saued an outlaw in his house, for rewarde of his kindenesse, he himselfe was condemned to die: not excepting them that had receiued their brothers, their sonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the rewarde of euery homicide and murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a slaue that had killed his maister, or the sonne that had slaine the father. But the most wicked & vniust act of all was, that he depriued the children, and sonnes sonnes of them whom he had killed, of all credit & good name, & besides that had taken all their goods as confiscate. And this was not only done in ROME, but also in all the cities of ITALIE through out: & there was no temple of any god whatsoeuer, no house in any bodies house, no liberty of hospitall, nor fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were slaine in their wiues armes, and the children on their mothers laps: and yet they which were slaine for priuate hatred & malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them might well say, his goodly great house made that man die, his goodly faire garden another: & his hotte bathes an other. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer meddled with any thing, and least looked that these euils should light vpon him, and that only for those which he saw so miserably murthered: went one day into the market place, & read the bill set vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cried out aloude: alas the day that euer I was borne, my house of ALBA maketh me to be put to death. He went not farre from the market place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time, Marius the yonger seeing he could by no means escape if he were taken, slue himselfe. And Sylla comming to PRÆNESTE, did first execute them by one and by one, keeping certaine forme of iustice in putting them to death: but afterwards as if he had no longer assure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of two thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword euery man, sauing his hoast only, whom he said, that he shewed him specially fauour to saue his life. But his hoast answered him stoutly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his countrimen: and so thrusting in amongst the citizens, was willingly slaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, who had slaine his owne brother before the ciuill warre was ended: and then praied Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereupon to shew his thankefulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently, and slue Marius, who was of the contrary faction: and brought him his head for a present before the people, in the middest of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went & washed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed fonte of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murthers committed, yet were there other things also that displeased the people maruellously. For he proclaimed himselfe Dictator, which office had not been of fiuescore yeares before in vse, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, and gaue him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to build cities, and to build vp new as he listed: to take away kingdomes, and to giue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly solde the goods confiscate, by the crier, sitting proudly and stately in his chaire of state, that it grieued the people more to see those goods packt vp by them, to whome he gaue and disposed them, then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For somtimes he would giue a whole country, or the whole territorie of certaine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleasant iesters, minstrels, or vnto slaues made free: and vnto some, he would giue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be married against their willes. For he desiring (howsoeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the great, commaunded him to put away his wife he had maried: and to take Æmylia (the daughter of Æmylius Scaurus, & of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, and caused him to mary her great with childe as she was by Glabrio: but she died in childbed in Pompeyes house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse in the city of PRÆNESTE: suing to be Consull, Sylla commanded him to cease his sute. But he notwithstanding that expresse commaundement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cause. Whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slue Offella before all the people: himselfe sitting in a chaire of estate in the temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from aboue the murther done. The people that were about Offella, laid hold of the murtherer straight & brought him before Sylla. But Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him go, because he commaunded him to do it. Furthermore as touching his triumphe, it was a sumptuous thing to behold, for the rarenesse of the riches, and princely spoiles which were shewed at the

yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished ROMAINES, who were the chiefest noble men of all the city of ROME, following his chariot triumphant, wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father, and sauiour: because that by his meanes they returned to their countrie, and recouered their goods, wiues, & children. At the end of his triumphe, he made an oration in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare vnto them (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his oration, tolde them that by reason of the great fauour that Fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to say, happy, or fortunate. And he himselfe, when he wrote vnto the GRECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them: surnamed himselfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloued and fauoured of Venus. His tokens of triumphe which are yet in our countrie, haue this superscription, Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter: he named his sonne Faustus, signifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausta: because the ROMAINES call Faustum that, which falleth out prosperously, and happely. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innouation in the commonwealth: yet of himselfe he left off his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man among the citizens, offering him also to euery man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stoute man of the enemy of his was chosen Consull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenance and fauour vnto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come merry homewards from the election, & ioyfull that he had obtained his friends suite from all other suters: tooke him a side, and told him: I do see thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly deede to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all ROME, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hadst not needed to sleepe: for thou hast strengthened a tyrant, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla hauing the dismes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding sumptuous feasts vnto the ROMAINES: the prouision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that euery day they threw great deale of meate into the riuer, and they dranke wine of forty yeares olde and aboue. During these feasts which continued many dayes, his wife Metella sickened, and died, and in her sickenesse the Priests and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neere her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was separated from her in her sickenesse, and caused her to be caried into an other house, whilest she died. And thus did Sylla curiously obserue the superstition and ordinance of the soothsayers: but he brake the law which he made himselfe, touching the order of funerals, sparing no man in Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake an other order himselfe had made, touching the reformation of banckets: comforting his sorrow with ordinary feasts, full of all vanitie and licentiousnesse. Within a fewe moneths after, he had fensers games at the sharpe: and the seates of the Theater being open and vncouered, men and women sitting together, it fortuned there was a faire Lady, and of a noble house, that sat hard by Sylla, called Valeria: she was the daughter of Messala, and sister of Hortensius the orator, and had bene diuorced not long before from her husband. This Lady passing by Sylla behinde him, did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and so went on to her place, and sate her downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiarity, looked earnestly vpon her: it is nothing (quoth she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a litle of your happinesse. Her boldnesse misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them: for he straight way began to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had liued. And many suche like words passed betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vpon euery occasion, with prety smiling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and contract mariage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as wise, as honest, and as vertuous a Lady as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla marry her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a louely and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a young boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest passions of the minde, to be so caried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this faire young Lady in his house, he left not the company of women minstrels & tumblers, and to haue pleasant iesters and musitians about him, with whom he would lie wallowing & drinking all the day long, vpon litle couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscius a maker of common playes, Sorex a prince of scoffers, & one Metrobius a singing man, whom he was in loue withall while he liued, & yet did not dissemble his loue, though he was past age to be beloued. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the originall cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he liued a great time before he perceiued that he had an impostume in his body, the which by processe of time came to corrupt his flesh in such sort, that it turned all to lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate selfe, but was presently filled with swarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to washe and clense himselfe of them, but all would not serue: for the changing of his flesh into this putriture wan it straight againe, that there was no clensing, nor shifting of him, that could keepe such a number of lice from him. Some say, that in olde time (amongst the most ancientest men, whereof there is any memorie) Acastus the sonne of Pelias, died of the lowsie euill: and long time after also, the Poet Aleman, and Pherecides the Diuine: and so did Callisthenes OLYNTHIAN in prison, and Mutina a wise lawier. And if we shall make mention of those that are famous men, although it be not in any good matter, we find that a bonde man called Eunus, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and caried to ROME, died also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not onely foresee his death, but he wrote some thing of it also: for he made an end of writing the two & twentith booke of his commentaries, two daies before he died. In that booke he saith, that the wise men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had liued honourably, he should end his daies in the flower of all his prosperitie. And there he setteth down that his sonne (who departed a litle before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe apparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thenceforth to liue in peace and rest with her, and all his disease, he would not giue ouer to deale in matters of state. For ten dayes before his death, he pacified a sedition, and tumult, risen among the inhabitants of the city of PLANVM (in Italian called POZZOLO) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, how they should gouerne themselues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius was in debt to the commonwealth, deferred paiment of his money looking for his debtor for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there caused his men to trouble him about, and commanded them to strangle him in his sight. The passion of his anger was so vehement against him, that by the extreame straining of himselfe, he brake the impostume of his body, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of bloud: by reason whereof his stomacke failing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and so died, leauing the two litle children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, and was called Posthumia, because the ROMAINES call those children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consuls Dues to let that his body should not be honorably buried, as they were accustomed to be the bodies of Noblemen & men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had left him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made some to speake for him, some by intreaty, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corps through ROME, gaue both safety and honor vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is said that the ROMAINE Ladies, amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfumes and odors odoriferous matter towards the same: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a great image to the likenesse of Sylla himselfe, and another of a sergeant carying the axes before him, all of excellent incence and synamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing least it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being so cloudie, they deferred to cary forth the body to be burnt, vntill past three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then rose there such a sodaine boisterous winde, that it set all the stake of wood straight a fire, that the body was burnt at a trice, and the fire going out, fell a great shower of raine that held on till night: so that it seemed good fortune following him euen to his ende, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the fielde of Marte: and they say that he himselfe made his owne epitaphe that is written vpon it, which was: that no man did euer passe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing mischiefe to his enemies. Syllaes epitaphe.

THE COMPARISON OF Sylla with Lysander.

NOw that we haue at large also set forth the life of the ROMAINS, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both a like, that both of them grew to be great men, rising of themselues through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lysander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vnto in the commonwealth, were laide vpon him through the peoples good wills and consents. For he compelled them to nothing, neither vsurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vpon them, contrary to lawe: for, as the common saying is:

Where partialitie, and discorde once do raigne:
There wicked men are most esteemde, and rule with greatest gaine.

For at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the state of gouernment vtterly ruined and brought to nought: to day there rose vp one tyrant, to morow an other. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vsurped and ruled all, when such fellowes as Glaucia and Saturninus, did both banish & driue out of ROME such men as Metellus was: and where also the assembly they slue Consuls sonnes in the market place, and where force of armes was bought & sold for gold and siluer, with the which the soldiers were corrupted: & where they made new lawes with fire and sword, and forced men to obey the same. Yet I speake not this in reproache of him that in such troublesome times founde meanes to make himselfe the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity he grew vnto in so vnfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came fro SPARTA The chiefe person is not alwaies the honestest.

(at what time it florished most, and was the best gouerned commonweale) he in all great causes, and in most honourable offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chiefes. Wherefore it happened, that the one resigned vp the authoritie to his countrimen the citizens, which they had giuen him, who also restored it to him againe many and sundry times: for the honour of his vertue did alwaies remaine, and made him iustly accounted for the worthiest man. Where the other being once onely chosen generall of an armie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hostilitie, making himselfe by force, sometime Consull, sometime vice Consull, and sometime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyrant. In deede Lysander attempted to change, and alter the state of gouernment in his countrie, howbeit it was with greater lenity, & more lawfully then Sylla did. For he sought it by reason, and good persuasion, not by the sworde: neither would he make a change of the whole at one selfe time as Sylla did, but sought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtlesse seemed very iust: that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all GREECE, not for her nobilitie, but for her vertue onely. For like as a good hunter doth not seeke for the whelpe of a good dog, but for the good dogge himselfe: nor a wise man of armes also, the colte that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse himselfe: Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a ciuil gouernment, committeth a fowle fault, if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince himselfe should be, considering that the LACEDÆMONIANS themselues haue depriued diuerse of their kings from their crowne and realme, because they were not Princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is it alwaies ill of it selfe: but vertue is honoured for her selfe alone, and not because she is placed with nobility. Nowe for the wrongs and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleasure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lysander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the most parte of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla sought for fight to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admiralty from Dolobella which he himselfe had giuen, & caused Lucretius Offella to be slaine openly in his owne sight because he sought to be Consull, for recompence of the good seruice he had done: for with the cruelty of his causing his owne friends to be slaine in such sort, he made euery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiours touching couetousnesse and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other, that of a tyrant. For we do not finde that Lysander for all his great Princely authority, did euer vse any insolencie or lasciuiousnesse in his deedes, but alwaies auoided as much as a man might, the reproache of the common proper be: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroade: he led such a true LACONIAN life. Straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull lusts neither for pouerty when he was young, nor yet for age, when it came vpon him. But whilest he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimoniall honestie and chastitie: himselfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adulteries, as Salust writeth. By meanes whereof he so much impouerished ROME, and left it so voide of golde and siluer: that for all die money he sold absolute freedome vnto the cities their confederats, yet was it his daylie die to confiscate and take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthiest houses in all the whole tie of ROME. But all this spoile and hauock was nothing in comparison of that which he lauishly cast away vpon his iesters and flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we thinke he had in his gifts at priuate banckets: when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME present, to see him sell the goods which he had caused to be confiscate) he made open sale to friends and familiars, to russe vp a great deale of household stuffe, for a very little price: and when any other had out bidden his price, and that the crier had cried it out aloude: then he was angry, & said: My friends, I haue great wrong done me here, not to suffer me sell the goods which I haue gotten at mine owne pleasure, and dispose it as I list my selfe. Where Lysander contrarily sent to the commonwealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very presents that were giuen to himselfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peraduenture he did more hurte to SPARTA, bringing thither that golde and siluer; then Sylla did to ROME, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely, for proofe and declaration that Lysander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their city, which neuer any other but them selues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithstanding to good order and gouernment: and Lysander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not infected withall him selfe. Thus were they both offendors, the one for breaking the law he commaunded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was him selfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to desire those things, which he aboue all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and ciuill gouernment. Now for matters of warre and battels fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lysander wan onely but two battels by sea, besides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I graunt him) being rightly considered, was no great exploite of war, howbeit it was a noble act, considering the fame he wanne by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the city of ALIARTE: a man might say peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinks also there was a fault in him, for that he staied not for king Pausanias aide (the which came from PLATEES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and because he went in a gaire in fury, and in a vaine ambition to runne his head against a wall: so that men of all sortes making a desperate saly out of ALIARTE vpon him, slue him there to no purpose. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that dyed at the battell of LEVCTRES, resisting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to giue them assured victory, receiued his deadly wound: for all these men died like noble kings, and valiant Captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast him selfe away, to his great dishonour, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the auncient SPARTANS did like wise men, to auoide the fight with walles. For the noblest and valiantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not onely by the first souldier that commeth, but by euery seely woman or childe. As they say that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary again, the victories that Sylla wanne in set battels, and the thousandes of enemies which he slue, are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he tooke the city of ROME twise, and the hauen of ATHENS: not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driuen Archelaus out of firme land into the maine sea. It is to be considered also, against what Captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a pastime, as a man might say, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to surprise and deceiue Philocles, a common orator at ATHENS:

Much worse then two edged sword, his busie tongue did seeme:
Which pratled still, and honestly did neuer once esteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchsafe to compare with his horsekeeper, nor Marius with one of his sergeaunts or masebearers. But to leaue a side the particular matters of all other Princes, Lordes, Consuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made wars with Sylla: what ROMAINE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of such power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenantes of armies in all ITALY, were there any euer more valiant, then Lamponius and Thesaurus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and slue the two last? But the greatest matter of all that we haue spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his noble actes, with the aide of his whole countrey: where Sylla to the contrary did his (being banished from his country) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time that they chased Sylla wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrew his houses, and slue his friendes also in euery place: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousandes of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventred his person in manifold dangers, so that in the end he conquered the all to the honor and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer stoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offred him, neither yeelde vnto him for any aide of men, or money, to warre against his enemies: but a thing most chiefly to be noted aboue the rest, he would not vouchsafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand openly, before he had spoken it with his owne mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would

forgoe ASIA, deliuer him his gallies, and giue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kings. This me thinkes was the goodliest act that euer Sylla did, proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to haue preferred the benefite of the common weale in that sort, before his priuate commodity. For therein he was like vnto a good greyhound that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast til he haue ouerthrowen him: & then afterwards followeth the recouery of his owne priuate quarrell. And lastly, me thinkes it is easie iudged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of ATHENS. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizens had made fierce warres with him for the increase of king Mithridates greatnes: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lysander to the contrary, seeing such a mighty state and Empire ouerthrowen from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and established therein very cruell and wicked tyrants. And therefore in mine opinion, we shall not much swerue from the troth, if we giue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lysander committed the fewer faultes. And that we giue to the one the honor of a continent and modest man, and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull souldier.

Plutarkes iudgement of Sylla and Lysander.

Peripoltas and his posterity.

PEripoltas the Soothsaier, he that brought king Opheltas out of THESALY into the coūtry of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time flourished in that country, the more part of the which were euer resident in the city of CHÆRONEA, because it was the first city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expulsed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were so forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inuasions of the MEDES into GREECE, and in the battels of the GAVLES) that they were slaine all of them, but onely Damon (a litle childe left behind fatherlesse and motherlesse) surnamed Peripolæa that escaped, who for goodly personage and noble courage excelled all the lusty youthes of his time, though otherwise he was very rude, and of a seuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growen of full age, a ROMAINE Captaine of an ensigne of footemen (lying in garrison for the winter season in the city of CHÆRONEA) fell in great loue with Damon: and because he could not reape the fruites of his dishoneſt loue by no intreaty nor giftes, there appeared vehement presumptions that by force he went about to abuse him, for that CHÆRONEA at that time (being my naturall city where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) litle regarded. Damon mistrusting the Captains villainy, and detesting his abhominable desire, watched him a conuenient turne, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compasse his enterprise) to bee a counsell with him, and take his part against the Captain. Now there were a sixteene of them in consort together, that one night blacked their faces all with soote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day set vpon this ROMAINE Captaine, that was making sacrifice in the market place, and slue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was straight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereuppon they called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocency for the fact done to the ROMAINS. But the selfe same night, as all the magistrates and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne-house according to their custome: Damon and his followers stale vpon them sodainly, slue them all, and fled againe vpon it. It chaunced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being sent on some iourney, passed by the city of CHÆRONEA with his army: and because this murther was but newly done, he staied there a few daies to examine the troth and originall thereof. And found that the commons of the city were in no fault, but that they themselues also had receiued hurt: whereupon he tooke the souldiers of the ROMAINS that remained of the garrison, and caried them away with him. In the meane time, Damon destroied all the country thereabout, and still houered neare to the city, insomuch as the inhabitantes of the same were driuen in the end to send vnto him, and by gentle words & fauorable degrees handled him so, that they intised him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongest them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus to say, a master of exercises of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his stoue or hotte house, starke naked as he was, they slue him by treason. And because that there appeared spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard groanings and sighings as our fathers tolde vs, they caused the dore of the hot-house to be walled vp: yet for all that, there are visions seene, and terrible voyces and cries heard in that selfe place vnto this present time, as the neighbours dwelling by doe testifie. Now they that were descended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of PHOCIDES, near vnto the city of STIRIS, who do only of all other both keepe the language and manners of the ATHENIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, signifying blacke, and besmered with soote: because when Damon and his fellowes did blacke their faces with soote, when they slue the ROMAINE Captaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neare neighbors vnto the CHÆRONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hiered an informer of ROME, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole city, (as if it had bene one priuate person alone) for the murther of the ROMAINES, whom Damon and his companions had slaine. The inditement was drawen, and the case pleaded before the gouernor of MACEDON, for that the ROMAINES did send no gouernors at that time into GREECE: and the counsellers that pleaded for the city of CHÆRONEA, relied vpon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselues to his report, who knew the troth and how it was. Thereuppon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of answer auerred the very troth: so was our city cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stoode in danger of vtter destruction. The inhabitants of the city of CHÆRONEA, for that they had escaped the danger by testimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honor him withall, they set vp his image of stone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be liuing at this present, though many yeares be gone and passed since, doe notwithstanding reckon our selues debters of his forepassed benefite. And because we are perswaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens manners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that representeth any mans person or shape onely: we will compre his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we compare and sort them one with an other. It shall be sufficient for vs therefore, that we shew our selues thankfull for his benefit, and we thinke, that he him selfe would mislike for reward of his true testimony, to be requited with a fauorable lie told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a passing faire face drawen, and liuely counterfeated, and that hath a excellent good grace withall, yet some manner of bleamish or imperfection in it: we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiously to shew it, because the one would deforme the counterfeate, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euen so, because it is a hard thing (or to say better, peraduenture impossible) to describe a man, whose life should altogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first study to write his vertues at large, and then by seeke perfectly to represent the troth, euen as the life it selfe. But where by chance we find certaine faultes and errors in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by necessity of the time or state of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednesse proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not neede too curiously to expresse in our history, but rather to passe them lightly ouer, of reuerent shame to the meere fraylty of mans nature, which cannot bring foorth a man of such vertue and perfection, but there is euer some imperfection in him. And therefore, considering with my selfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it best to compare him with Cimon, because they haue beene both valiant souldiers against their enemies, hauing both done notable exploites in warres against the barbarous people: and moreouer, they haue both beene curteous and mercifull vnto their citizens, and were both the onely men that pacified the ciuill wars and dissention in their countrey, & both the one and the other of them wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine before Cimon, nor ROMAINE Captaine before Lucullus, that made wars so far off from their countrey leauing apart the deedes of Bacchus and of Hercules and the deedes also of Perseus against the AETHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS and the deedes of Iason also: if there remaine any monument extant since their time, worthy of credit in these our daies. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that they neuer ended their warres, they onely ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them together. Againe, they may note in them a great resemblaunce of nature, for their honest curtesie and humanity, which they shewed vnto straungers in their countrey: and for their magnificence and sumptuousnes of their life and ordinary expence. It may be we doe leaue some other similitudes betweene them: howbeit in the discourse of their liues they will appeare. Cimon was the son of Miltiades and of Hegesipyle, a THRACIAN woman borne the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde written in certaine poetical verses which Melanthius and Archelaus haue written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the historiographer him selfe who was of kinne also vnto Cimon, was called in like maner Olorus, shewing by the agreement of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his auncesters, and did also possesse much gold in the countrey of THRACIA. It is said moreouer that he died in a certaine place called the dirchy forrest, where he was slaine: howbeit that his ashes and bones were caried into the countrey of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, among st the tombes of those of the house and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne sister called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Miltiades of the village of LACIA. This Miltiades Cimons father, being condemned by the state to pay the summe of fifty talents, was for non payment cast into prison, and there died: and left Cimon and his sister Elpinice aliue, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his first young yeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drunkard following his grandfather Cimons fashions vp and downe, as he had also his name: saying that his grandfather for his beastlines was surnamed Coalemos, as much to say as foole. Stesimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned musicke, nor any other of the liberall sciences accustomably taught to young noble mens sonnes of GRECE, and that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper vnto children born in the countrey of ATTICA: howbeit that hee was of a noble minde, and plaine, without dissimulation, so that he rather liued PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was euen such as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be. Cimons conditions.

A simple man he was, and could not well disguise As honest eke in things of weight, as wit could well deuise.

This serued fitly to be applied vnto Stesimbrotus wordes written of him: but notwithstanding, in his first young yeares he was suspected of incontinency with his sister, who in deede otherwise had no very good name. For she was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners vpon the wals of the gallery, called the Pleasaunce, and now Pœcile: (to say, set out and beautified with diuers pictures) he drue (as they say) LAODICAS face vppon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for monies sake, but gaue his labour franckely to the common wealth, as all the historiographers that wrote in that time doe witnesse: and as the Poet Melanthius also reciteth in these verses: Elpinice Cimons sister vnchast. Polygnotus the painter.

At his owne proper charge, great cost he hath bestowed, In decking vp our temples here with gilted roofes embowed, For honor of the goddes. And in our towne likewise, He hath adorned the common place, with many a fine deuise: Painting and setting forth, in stately shew to see,
The images of demy goddes that here amongest vs be.

Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly company with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull maried wife, because she could not for her pouerty haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her selfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richest men of the city, did afterwardes fall in fansie with her, and desired to marie her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fifty talents, wherein he stoode condemned a debter to the state, so that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vppon that condition maried his sister Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithstanding, it is certaine that Cimon was somewhat amorous, and giuen to loue women. For Melanthius the Poet in certaine of his elegies, maketh mention for his pleasure of one Asteria borne at SALAMINA, and of an other called Mnestra, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoubtedly, he loued his lawfull wife Isodice maruellous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles sonne, and tooke her death very grieuously, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were written vnto him, to comfort him in his sorrow. Panætius the Philosopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Phisitian wrote those elegies: and sure it is not vnlikely, considering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions deserued great commendation. For his valiantnesse he gaue no place vnto Miltiades, and for his wisedome and iudgement, he was not inferior vnto Themistocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuster and honester man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valiantnesse of a noble Captaine: and he did much excell them both in the properties of a good gouernour, and in the administration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the comming in of the MEDES counselled the people of ATHENS to goe out of the city, to leaue their landes and countrey, and to shippe into gallies, and fight with the barbarous people by sea in the straight of SALAMINA: as every man was wondering at his bolde and vertuous counsell, Cimon was the first man that went with a life and iolitie through the streete Ceramicus, vnto the castell, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carying a bitte of a bridle in his hand to consecrate vnto the goddesse Minerua, signifying thereby, that the city had no needs of horsemen at that time, but of mariners and sea men. And after hee had giuen vp his offering, hee tooke one of the targettes that hung vppon the wall of the temple, and hauing made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the hauen, and was the first that made the most part of the citizens to take a good heart to them, and coragiously to leaue the land, and Elpinice being poore, had regard to match according to her state and calling. take the ſea. Beſides all this, he was a man of a goodly ſtature, as Ion the Poet teſtifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought ſo valiantly at the day of the battell, that he wanne immediatly great reputation, with the loue and good will of euery man. So that many were ſtill about him to encourage him to be liuely and valiant, and to thinke thenceforth to doe ſome actes worthy of the glory that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwardes, ſo ſoone as he beganne to deale in matters of ſtate, the people were marueilous glad of him, and were wearied with Themiſtocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was preſently aduanced and preferred to the chiefeſt offices of honor in the city, being very well thought on of the common people, becauſe of his ſoft and plaine nature. Moreouer, Ariſtides alſo did greatly further his aduancement, becauſe he ſaw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vſe him as a counterpeaſe to controll Themiſtocles craft & ſtoutnes. Wherefore after the MEDES were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being ſent for by the ATHENIANS for their generall by ſea, when the city of ATHENS had then no maner of rule nor commandement, but followed king Pauſanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his countrey men and citizens in marueilous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to doe good ſeruice, then any other nation in the whole army whatſoeuer. And when king Pauſanias had practiſed with the barbarous people to betray GREECE, had written alſo to the king of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and ſtraightly with the confederates of his countrey, and committed many inſolent partes by reaſon of the great authority he had, and through his fooliſh pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwiſe, gentlely entertained them whom Pauſanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his curteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing no eye to his doings, ſtale away the rule and commaundement of all GREECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be ſole Lordes of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his ſweete tongue, and gracious manner of vſing all men. For the moſt part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Pauſanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and ſubmitted thẽ ſelues vnder the protection of Cimon and Ariſtides: who did not onely receiue them, but wrote alſo to the counſel of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they ſhould call Pauſanias home, for that he diſhonored SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they ſay that king Pauſanias being on a time in the city of BYZANCE, ſent for Cleonice, a yong maiden of a noble houſe, to take his pleaſure of her. Her parents durſt not keepe her from him, by reaſon of his cruelty, but ſuffered him to cary her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pauſanias chamber to take away the lightes, and thinking in the darke to come to Pauſanias bed that was aſleepe, groping for the bed as ſoftly as ſhee could to make no noiſe, ſhee vnfortunately hit againſt the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made ſuch a noiſe, that it waked him on the ſodaine, and thought ſtraight therewithall that ſome of his enemies had beene come traiterouſly to kill him, whereupon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beddes head, and ſo ſtabbed it in the young virgine, that ſhe died immediately vppon it. Howbeit ſhee neuer let Pauſanias take reſt after that, becauſe her ſpirit came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine haue ſlept, and ſpake this angrily to him in verſe, as followeth.

Pauſanias killed the yong Bizantine virgine.

Keepe thou thy ſelfe vpright, and iuſtice ſee thou feare, For woe and ſhame be vnto him, that iuſtice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did ſo ſtirre vp all the confederates hearts againſt him, that they came to beſiege him in BIZANTIVM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whõ notwithſtanding he eſcaped, and ſecretly ſaued him ſelfe. And becauſe that this maidens ſpirite would not let him reſt, but vexed him continually: he fled vnto the city of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that coniured dead ſpirites, and there was the ſpirite of Cleonice coniured to pray him to be contented. So ſhee appeared vnto him, and told him that he ſhould be deliuered of all troubles ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA: ſignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he ſhould ſuffer there. Diuers writers doe thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRECIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was aduertiſed that certaine great men of PERSIA, & allied to the king him ſelf, who kept the city of EIONA vpon the riuer of Strymon in the country of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he tooke the sea with his armie, and went thither, where at his first comming he vanquished and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: & hauing ouerthrowen them, draue all the rest into the citie of EIONE. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other side of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forsake the countrie, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himselfe. Whereupon he held them that were besieged at EIONE so straightly from victuals, that Butes the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant, dispairing of the state of the citie, set fire on the same, and burnt himselfe, his friendes, and all the goods it in. By reason wherefore, the spoile taken in that citie was but small, because the barbarous people burnt all the best things in it with themselues: howbeit he conquered the countrie thereabouts, and gaue it the ATHENIANS to inhabite, being a very pleasant and fertile soyle. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS suffered him to consecrate and set vp openly three Hermes of stone (which are foure square pillers) vpon the tops of the which they set vp heades of Mercurie: vpon the first of the three pillers, this inscription is grauen.

Butes burneth himselfe, citie, and friends, for feare of Cimon.

Statues of Mercurie.

The people truly were, of courage stout and fierce, Who hauing shut the Medes fast vp (as stories do rehearce) Within the walled towne, of Eione that tide, Which on the streame of Strymon stands: they made them there abide The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feele, The dynt of warre so many a time, with trustie tooles of steele:
Till in the end, despaire so pearced in their thought,
As there they did destroy themselues, and so were brought to nought.

Vpon the second there is such an other.

The citizens which dwell in Athens stately towne, Haue here set vp these monuments, and pictures of renowne, To honor so the factes, and celebrate the fame, Their valiant chieftaines did atchiene, in many a martiall game.
That such as after come, when they thereby perceiue, How men of seruice for their deedes, did rich rewards receiue, Encouraged may be, such men for to resemble,
In valiant actes and dreadfull deedes, which make their foes to tremble.

And vpon the third an other.

When Mnestheus did leade forth of this citie here, An armie to the Troyane warres, (by Homer doth appeare) He was aboue the rest, that out of Gracia went:
A valiant knight, a worthy wight, a Captaine excellent,
To take in hand the charge, an armie for to guide:
And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide.
That praise of prowesse then (ô graue Atheniens)
Is now no newes to fill the eares of these your citizens.
Since through the world so wide, the fame and worthy praise, For martiall feates, to you of yore hath iudged bene alwaies.

Now, though Cimons name be not comprised in these inscriptions, yet they thought that it was a singular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themistocles had euer the like. For when Miltiades requested the people one day that they would licence him to weare a garland of oliue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, that standing vp in open assembly spake against him, and said a thing that marueilously pleased the people, though indeede it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good turne he had done to the common wealth. When you haue Miltiades (said he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aske to be honoured alone also. But how was it then, that Cimons seruice was so acceptable to the ATHENIANS? It was in mine opinion,

because they had with other Captaines fought to defend themselues and their countrie only: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had assaulted and driuen their enemies home to their owne dores, where they conquered the cities of EIONE and of Amphipolis, which afterwards they did inhabite with their owne citizens, and wan there also the Ile of SCYROS which Cimon tooke vppon this occasion. The DOLOPIANS did inhabite it, who were a people, and liued without labour or tillage, and had bene rouers of the sea of a wonderfull long time, vsing piracie altogether to maintaine themselues withall: so that in the end they spared not so much as the marchants & passengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine THESSALIANS that went thither to trafficke. And when they had taken their goods from them, yet would they cast them in prison besides. Howbeit the prisoners found meanes to escape, and after they had saued themselues, repaired to the parlament of the AMPHICTIONS which is a generall councell of all the states and people of GREECE. The AMPHICTIONS vnderstanding the matter, condemned the city of the SCYRIANS to pay a great summe of money. The citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, and bad them that robbed the marchantes and had the goods in their handes, pay it if they would. And therefore, because there was no other likelihood, but that the theeues themselues should be driuen to answere the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his armie and they would deliuer their citie into his hands: the which was performed. And Cimon hauing cõquered this Iland, draue out the DOLOPIANS thence, & rid the sea Ægeum of all pirates thereby. That done, remembring that the ancient Theseus, the sonne of Ægeus flying from ATHENS came into that Iland of SCYROS, where king Lycomedes suspecting his comming had traiterously slaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to seeke out his tombe, because the ATHENIANS had an oracle and prophecie, that commaunded them to bring the ashes and bones backe againe to ATHENS, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitants of the Ilande would neuer before confesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much a doe found the tombe, put his bones abord the Admirall galley sumptuously decked and set foorth, and brought them againe into his countrie, foure hundred yeares after Theseus death. For this the people thanked him maruellously, and therby he wanne exceedingly the ATHENIANS good willes: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragicall playes of Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man had played his first tragedy, Apsephion, the president perceiuing there was great strife and contention amongst the lookers on would not drawe them by lottes that should be iudges of this play, to giue the victorie to that Poet that had best deserued: but when Cimon & the other Captaines were come into the Theater to see the same (after they had made their accustomed oblations vnto the god, in honor nor of whom these plaies were celebrated) he staied, and made them to minister an othe[r] tenne, (which were of euery tribe of the people one) and the othe being giuen, he caused them to sit as iudges to giue sentence, which of the Poets should carie away the prise. He made all the Poets striue and contend who best should do, for the honour of the iudges: Sophocles by their sentence bare away the victorie. But AEschilus (as they say) was so angry & grieued withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, and went for spight into Sicile where he died and was buried neere vnto the citie of GELA. Ion writeth that he being a young boy, newly come from CHIO vnto ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons house, and that after supper when they had giuen the goddes thankes, Cimon was requested by the company to sing. And he did sing with so good a grace, that euery man praised him that heard him, & said he was more courteous then Themistocles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play vpon the citherne, answered them, hee was neuer taught to sing nor play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich and mighty citie. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to an other, as falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and hauing rehearsed the chiefest of them, he himselfe tolde one, which was the notablest and wisest part of all the rest that euer he plaied. For the ATHENIANS and their confederates together, hauing taken great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIA the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to diuide the spoyle amongst them. Whereupon he made the diuision, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themselues, and laide the spoiles and their apparell by themselues. The confederates found this distribution very vnequall: but neuertheless Cimon gaue them the choice to choose which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counsell rather to take the spoiles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themselues, and so they did: for they tooke the spoile of the prisoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time of the cõmon souldiers to be but an ill deuider of spoile, because that the confederats caried away great store of chains, bankanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN fashion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But shortly after, the parentes and friendes of these prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA & LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great ransome: so that Cimon gathered such a masse of readie money together by their ransome, as he defraied the whole charges of all his gallies with the same for the space of foure moneths after, and left a great summe of money besides in the sparing treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, bestowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honorably againe, in relieuing his poore decaied citizens. For he brake vp all his hedges and inclosures, and laide them plaine and open, that trauellers passing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much frute thereof as they would, without any manner danger. And furthermore, kept a continuall table in his house, not furnished with many dishes, but with meat sufficient for many persons, and where his poore country men were daily refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinary: so as they needed not otherwise care to labor for their liuing, but might be the readier, & haue the more leasure to serue the common wealth. Yet Aristotle the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for al the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men only in the village of LACIA, where hee was borne. Furthermore, he had alwaies certaine young men waiting on him of his household seruants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the citie, any old citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of these young men strip himselfe, and change apparell with the old man: and that was very well thought of, and they all honored him for it. Moreouer, these young men caried euer good store of money about them: and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or else where, knowing his pouertie, they secretly gaue him money in his hand, and said neuer a word. Which the Poet selfe Cratinus seemeth to touche of, in a comedie of his intituled the Archiloches.

The name of Lichas SPARTAN, hath bene famous amongst the GRECIANS: and yet we know no other cause why, sauing that he vsed to feast strangers that came to LACEDEMON at their festiuall day, to see the sportes and exercises of the young men dauncing naked in the same. But the magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceede the auncient liberalitie, courtesie, and hospitalitie of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the first men that taught the

GRECIANS through out all GREECE, how they ſhould ſow corne, and gather it to maintaine themſelues withall, and alſo ſhewed them the vſe of wels, and how they ſhould light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an hoſpitall of his owne houſe, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting ſtrangers that trauelled by his groundes to gather ſuch fruits there, as the time and ſeaſon of the yere yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world the goods to be common amongſt them, as the Poets ſay they were in the olde time of Saturnes raigne. And now, where ſome accuſed this honeſt liberalitie of Cimon, obiecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good wils by that meanes the maner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke part with the nobilitie, and liued after the LACEDEMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies againſt Themiſtocles, who without all compaſſe of reaſon encreaſed the authoritie and power of the people: and for this cauſe he ioyned with Ariſtides, and was againſt Ephialtes, who would for the peoples ſake haue put downe and aboliſhed Ariopagus court. And where all other gouernors in his time were extortioners and bribetakers: (Ariſtides and Ephialtes onely excepted) he to the contrarie led an vncorrupt life in adminiſtration of iuſtice, & euer had cleane hands, whatſoeuer he ſpake or did, for the ſtate and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any man liuing. And for proofe hereof, we finde it written, that a noble man of PERSIA called Reſaces, being a traitor to his maſter the king of PERSIA, fled on a time vnto ATHENS: where being continually bayted and wearied, with the common accuſations of theſe tale bearers and picke thanks, that accuſed him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimon, & brought him home to his owne dore two bowles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of ſiluer, which be peeces of money ſo called, becauſe that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon ſeeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chooſe, to haue him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous noble man anſwered him, that he had rather haue him his friend. Then ſaid Cimon to him againe, away with thy gold and ſiluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that gold and ſiluer ſhall euer be at my commaundement, to take and diſpoſe it as I haue neede. About that time began the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the warres againſt the barbarous people, deſiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to haue leaſure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alſo, conſidering that they had driuen their enemies out of their countrie, that now they did them no more hurt: by reaſon whereof they paied the money they were aſſeſſed at, but they would furniſh no moe men nor ſhippes as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and profecuted law againſt them that failed paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that cruelly, that they made the ſeigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hateſull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary courſe to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and voide ſhips of them that would not, or could not ſerue in perſons, being very glad to ſuffer them to become ſlothfull mongrels in their houſes, for much reſt, and to tranſpoſe themſelues from good ſouldiers which they had beene, to husbanders, marchantes, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the ſlothfull deſire they had to liue pleaſantly at home. And contrarily, cauſing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after an other to ſerue in gallies, he ſo acquainted them with continuall paines in his viages: that he made them in ſhort ſpace become Lordes and maſters ouer them that gaue them pay and entertainement. For they beganne by little and litle to flatter and fauour the ATHENIANS, whom they ſaw trained continually in the warres, euer bearing armour, and caryng their weapons in their hands, becomming expert ſouldiers at their charge, by reaſon of the pay they gaue them: ſo that in the ende, they became ſubiectes and contributaries vnto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there neuer was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the crueltie and power of that mightie PERSIAN king, then Cimon did. For, after he had driuen him out of all GREECE, he left him not ſo much following him foot hotte, as we cõmonly ſay, before the barbarous people could take breath, or giue wiſe and direct order for their doings: he made ſo great ſpeede, that he tooke of their cities from them by force, and other some by practise, causing them to rebell against the king, and turne to the GRECIANS side. Insomuch as there was not a man of warre left for the king of PERSIA in all ASIA, from the country of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being aduertised that the kings Captaines were vppon the coast of PAMPHYLIA with a great armie by sea, because he would feare them in such sort, that they should not braue any more to shewe themselues vppon the sea, on this side of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GINDOS, and from the citie of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred gallies, the which at the first had beene excellently well made and deuised by Themistocles, as well for swift sayling, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might cary the greater number of men of warre in battell, to assault the enemies. And so went first against the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS borne, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receiue their armie into their hauens) landed there, destroyed all the country, and then came and camped with his armie hard at their wals. But the men of CHIO being auncient friends of the PHASELITES, and in Cimons armie at that iorney, did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertisement to them of the citie of their doings by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and shot ouer the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace with condition, that the PHASELITES should pay tenne talents for a fine: and furthermore should also follow the armie of the GRECIANS, and from thencefoorth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorus saith, that the PERSIAN Captaine that had charge of the armie by sea, was called Tithraustes, and the Captaine of the armie by lande, Pherendates. But Callisthenes writeth, that Ariomandes the sonne of Gobrias, was the kings Lieutenant, hauing chiefe authoritie ouer the whole armie that lay at ancker before the riuer of Eurymedon, and had no desire to fight, because they looked for a new supply of fourescore saile of the PHENICIANS, that should come to them from CYPRVS. But Cimon contrarily, sought to fight before these gallies of the PHENICIANS came to ioyne with them, and put his gallies in order of battell, determining to giue a charge, and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not. Which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew neerer into the mouth of the riuer Eurymedon, because they should not compasse them in behinde, nor force them to come to battell against their willes. Which notwithstanding when they saw the ATHENIANS come to set vpon them where they lay, they made out against them a fleete of sixe hundred saile, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fiftie saile onely. But they did nothing worthie of so great a power, at the least touching the fight by sea, but turned their prowes straight to the riuer: where such as could recouer the mouth thereof in time saued themselues, flying to their armie by lande, which was not farre from that place set also in order of battell. But the rest that were taken tardie by the way, they were slaine, and their gallies sunke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were lost as it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two hundred of them prisoners. In the meane season, their armie by lande came neerer to the sea side: which Cimon perceiuing, stood in some doubt whether he should land his men or not, because it seemed a hard and dangerous thing vnto him, to lande in spight of his enemies: and furthermore the GRECIANS alreadie wearied with the first battell against the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, fresh, and lustie, and withall many in number against one. Nathelesse, perceiuing that his men trusted in their force, besides the courage which the victorie gaue them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he set them a land while they were whotte yet with the first battell. And so with great furie and loud cries they ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who stood still and starred, and receiued their first charge very valiantly: by reason whereof, the battell grew sharpe and bloudy, insomuch as there were slaine all the greatest personages and men of best account in the ATHENIANS armie. But the other fought it out so valiantly, that in the ende they draue the field, and with marueilous difficultie made the barbarous people flie, whereof they slew great number in the place, and tooke the rest prisoners with all their tents & pauilions, which were full of all sortes of riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant champion of the holy games, hauing in one selfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by sea also which the GRECIANS had wonne within the channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then vpon the land: and the battell which the GRECIANS wanne by land before the cite of PLATEES, with that which he wan the day before on the sea: yet he was not contented with all this. For, after two so famous victories obteined, he would once againe fight for the honour of the tokens of triumph: and being aduertised that the fourescore saile of the PHENICIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arriued at the head of Hydra, he sailed thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this fleete, knewe no certaintie of the ouerthrow of their chiefest armie, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was ouerthrowen in that sort: and therefore were they so much the more affraide, when they descried a farre off the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they lost all their ships, and the greatest part of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. This victorie against the PERSIANS did so daunt and plucke downe the pride and lofty minde of the barbarous PERSIAN king, as he made that condition of peace so much spoken of in ancient histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armies thenceforth should come no neerer to the GRECIAN sea, then the carrere of a horse, and that he would saile no further forward, then the Iles CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any gallies or other ships of warre. Howbeit the historiographer Callisthenes writeth, that it was no part of any article comprised within the condition of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this great an ouerthrowe: and that afterwardes he kept so farre from the GRECIAN sea, that Pericles with fiftie saile, and Ephialtes with thirtie only, did saile beyond the Iles CHELIDONIA, and no barbarous fleete euer came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common actes of ATHENS, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true in deede. And it is saide, that for this occasion the ATHENIANS built an aulter of peace, and that they did Callias great honor, for that he was sent Ambassador vnto the king of PERSIA to take his othe for confirmation of this peace. So when all these spoiles of the enemies were sold to the that would giue most, there was such store of gold and siluer in the sparing coffers of their treasurie, that there was enough to serue their turne for any seruice they would employ it to, & besides that, they had sufficient to build vp the side of the wall of the castle which looketh towardes the south, this voyage and great spoyle did so enrich them. And it is saide moreouer, that the building of the long walles that ioyne to the citie with the hauen, which they call the legges, was built & finished afterwards: howbeit the first foundations therof were built with the money Cimon gaue towardes it, for that the worke met with moorish and waterie places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the marisses, with force of flints and great logges, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he also that first did beautifie and set forth the citie of ATHENS, with places of liberall exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he caused plantrees to be set in the market place: and the Academie which before was very dry and naked he made is now a pleasant groue, and full of goodly springs which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbors to walke in, and goodly long smooth allies to runne a good course in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine PERSIANS dwelling in CHERSONESVS (to say a demie Ile of the country of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but sent to the people of high THRACIA, to pray their aide to defende themselues against Cimon: of whom they made but litle account, because he was departed from ATHENS with a very fewe ships: who set vpon them only with foure gallies, and tooke thirteene of theirs. And so hauing driuen the PERSIANS out of CHERSONESVS, and subdued the THRACIANS, he conquered the country of CHERSONESVS, from THRACIA vnto his own country. And departing thence, went against them of the Ile of THASOS, that had rebelled against the ATHENIANS, and hauing ouercome them in battell by sea, he wanne three and thirtie of their ships, besides that tooke their citie by siege, and wanne the mines of golde lying beyonde the sea to the ATHENIANS, with all the landes that belonged vnto them. This conquest opened the way open into MACEDON, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the best part thereof at that present time. But because he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he suspected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by presents of king Alexander: whereupon, his secret enemies layd their heades together, and accused him. But Cimon to cleare himselfe before the iudges of this accusation, sayd vnto them: I haue practised friendship neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as some other haue done, to receiue both honour and profit by them. But indeede I am a friend to the LACEDÆMONIANS, for I confesse I loue them, and desire to follow their sobrietie, and temperance of life, the which I preferre and esteeme aboue any riches or treasure: although I am very glad notwithstanding to inrich our state and common wealth with the spoyles of our enemies. Stesimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and sayth: that his sister Elpinicè went to Pericles house, (who was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to pray him not to deale so extremely with her brother: & that Pericles laughing on her, sayd, alas, thou art too old, Elpinicè, thou, now to ouercome these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cause came to hearing, he was a more gentle aduersarie, then any other of his accusers, and rose vp but once to speake against him, and that for manners sake onely: so that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And furthermore, so long as he was present in ATHENS, he alwayes kept the seditious people in obedience, who would euer crosse and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, because they would haue all the sway and rule in their owne handes. But when Cimon was sent abroad any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no body to gainesay them, turned, and altered the gouernement of the citie topsie turuey, and confounded all the ancient lawes and customes which they had obserued of long time, and that by the procurement and setting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of causes in manner from the court of Areopagus, and put all authoritie of matters iudiciall into the hands of the people, & brought the state of the citie into a pure Democratia, to say, a common weale ruled by the sole and absolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauoured the people's faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the authority of the Senate and counsell so shamefully defaced & troden vnder foote, was maruellously offended withall, & sought to restore the ancient state of iudgement againe as it was before, and set vp the gouernement of the nobilitie (called Optimatia) that was established in the time of Clisthenes. But they began their enemies againe with open mouth to cry out vpon him, reuiuing the old former naughtie rumour that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne sister: and furthermore accusing him, that he did fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongst other things there ranne in the people's mouthes the verses of the Poet Eupolis, which were made against Cimon.

No wicked man he was, but verie negligent,
And there withall to wine much more, then vnto money bent.
He stale sometimes away, at Sparta for to sleepe:

And if it be so, that being thus negligent and giuen to wine, he haue gotten so many cities, and wonne such sundry great battels: it is out of doubt then that if he had bene sober and carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor since any GRECIAN Captaine, that had passed him in glory of the warres. Indeede it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twynnes which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedæmonius, and the other Eleus, as Stesimbrotus writeth, saying that for that Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers stocke. Howbeit Diodorus the cographer writeth that both those two, and an other third called Thessalus, were borne of Isodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the sonne of Alcmæacles. Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauour and countenaunce which the LACEDÆMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a young man, did beare more sway in ATHENS then he. Which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning: for the good will of the LACEDÆMONIANS towardes him, did bring them great commodity. For when the ATHENIANS began to grow of great power, and to practise secretly that the confederats of the GRECIANS should forsake the LACEDÆMONIANS to ioyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angry withall, for the honour and loue they bare vnto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of GRECE at that time, because he was very curteous vnto the confederates, and also thankefull vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. But afterwardes when the ATHENIANS were aloft and of great power, and that they saw Cimon stucke not for a litle matter with the LACEDÆMONIANS, but loued them more thē they would haue had him: they began then to enuie him, because in all his matters he had to do, he euer highly praised and extolled the LACEDÆMONIANS before them. But specially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perswade them to do any thing: the LACEDÆMONIANS, sayd he, I warrant ye do not so. That, as Stesimbrotus sayth, made him maruellously to be maliced of the people. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out vpon this occasion. The fourth yeare of the raigne of Archidamus, the sonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, there fortuned the wonderfullest and most fearefull earthquake in the citie of LACEDÆMON, and there abouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the country opened, and fell as into a bottomlesse pit. The mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the citie was layed on the ground and ouerthrowen, fiue houses onely excepted, the rest being wholly destroyed. And it is sayd also, that a litle before this earthquake came, the young men of that citie were playing with the young boyes exercising thēselues starke naked vnder a great galery couered ouer: and as they were sporting together, there started vp a hare hardby thē. The young men spying her, ranne after the hare starke naked and oyled as they were, with great laughter. They were no sooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell down vpon the boyes that were left, and squashed them all to death. And in memorie of the same, the towne where they were afterwardes buried, is called vnto this day Sismatias, as much to say, as the tombe of those which the earthquake had slaine. But king Archidamus foreseeing straight vpō the sodaine the danger that was to come, by that he saw present, perceiuing his citizens busie in sauing their houshold stuffe, and that they were running out of their houses: made the trumpetters to sound a hot alarome vpon it, as if their enemies had come stealingly vpon them to take the citie, to the end that all the inhabitants should presently repayre vnto him (setting all busines apart) with armour and weapon. That sodaine alarome doubtlesse saued the citie of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOTÆ, which are their slaues and bondmen in the country of LACONIA, and the country clownes of litle villages there abouts, came running armed out of all parts, to spoyle and robbe them vpon the sodaine, that were escaped from this earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then began afterwardes to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawn certaine of their neighbours vnto their confederacie, and specially the MESSENIANS, who made hot warres vpon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS sent Periclides vnto ATHENS to demande ayde: whom Aristophanes the Poēt mocking, sayd.

With visage pale and wanne, he on the aulter sate,

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not aide nor succour a city that was an enemy vnto ATHENS, but rather suffer it to fall to the ground, and spurne the pride and arrogancy of SPARTA vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Critias sayth) hauing more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for the enlarging & encreasing of his owne country: brought it to passe by his perswasion, that the ATHENIANS sent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearseth the very selfe wordes that Cimon vsed to moue the people to graunt his request. For he besought them that they would not suffer GRECE to halt, as if LACEDÆMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: nor to suffer their citie to lose an other citie their friend, and subiect to the yoke and deceit of GRECE. Hauing therfore obteined ayde, to lead vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, he went with his army through the CORINTHIANS country: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of CORINTHE was maruellously offended, saying, that he should not haue entred into their country with an army, before he had asked licence of the of the citie. For sayd he, when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the maister of the house commaunde him

him. But ye CORINTHIANS (sayd Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEONÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinking that all should be open vnto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stoutly aunswere the CORINTHIAN Captaine againe, because it stood him vpon, and so went on with his army through the country of CORINTHE. Afterwardes the LACEDÆMONIANS sent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require ayde against the MESSENIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their slaues) who had wonne the citie of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDÆMONIANS were afrayd of the great power they had brought, and of their boldnesse besides: wherefore they sent them backe againe, and would not imploy them of all other their confederats that came to their succour, because they knew them to be men very tickle, desiring change and alterations. The ATHENIANS returned home, misliking much that they were sent backe againe, in somuch as euer after they hated thē that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDÆMONIANS sake therefore, taking a small occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their country for ten yeares: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were banished with the Ostraciſmon banishment. Now within the terme of these ten yeares, the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuned to vndertake the deliuery of the city of DELPHES, from the seruitude and bondage of the PHOCIANS, and to put them from the custodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the sayd city. Wherfore, to obtaine their desire and purpose, they came to plant their camp neare vnto the citie of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon vnderstanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS camp armed, with intent to do his duety to fight with his country men against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and so went into the bandes of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was himselfe. But his owne country enemies cried out against him, and sayd, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwardes bring them to the citie selfe of ATHENS. Whereupon the great councell of the fiue hundred men were afrayed, and sent to the Captaines to commaund them they should not receiue him into the battell: so that Cimon was compelled to depart the camp. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other friends that were suspected as himselfe was to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings: that they should do their best endeuour to fight valiantly against their enemies, to the intent their good seruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towardes their country men: and so they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the souldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were a hundred in all, they set them apart by themselues in a squadron, and fought it so valiantly and desperatly, that they were slaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the ATHENIANS maruellous sory for them, & repenting thē that they had so vniustly mistrusted them as traitours to their county. Wherefore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partly as I am perswaded, because they called his former good seruice to minde which he had done to their country aforetime, and partly also, because the necessitie of the time so required it. For the ATHENIANS hauing lost a great battell before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the spring of the yeare, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would inuade them with a great power: wherefore they repealed Cimons banishmēt by decree, whereof Pericles self was the onely authour & procurer. So mild and temperat were mens enmities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publicke state and weale: and so much did their ambition (being the most vehement pasion of all other, & that most troubleth mens mindes) giue place, and yeeld to the necessities & affaires of the common weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he straight pacified the warre, and reconciled both cities together. And when he saw that the ATHENIANS could not liue in peace, but would be doing still, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for glories sake: to preuent them that they should not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by rouing and coasting vp & downe the country of PELOPONNESVS, and the Iles of GRECE, with so great a nauie, should moue occasion of ciuill warres amongst the GRECIANS, or of complaints vnto their confederates against them: he rigged & armed out two hundred galles to go againe to make warre in CYPRVS, and in EGYPT, because he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the warres of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the spoyles of those their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readinesse to depart, and the army prest to ship & sayle away: Cimon dreaming in the night had this vision. It seemed vnto him that he saw a bitch angry with him, and barking earnestly at him, and that in the middest of her barking, she spake with a mans voyce, and sayd vnto him:

Cimons dream.

Come hardily, spare not for if thou come by me, My whelpes, and I which here do stand, will quickely welcome thee.

This vision being very hard to interpret, Astyphilus borne in the citie of POSIDONIA, a man expert in such coniectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this vision did betoken his death, expounding it in this sort. The dogge commonly is an enemie to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing gladdeth our enemie more, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voyce with the barking of a bitch, signifieth nothing else, but an enemie of the MEDES: because the armie of the MEDES is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRECIANS together. Besides this vision, as he did sacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the beast after it was sacrificed, about the bloud that fell to the ground, there assembled a swarme of antes, which caried the congealed bloud off from the ground by litle and litle, and layed it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the last spyed it by chance, and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the minister of the sacrifice brought the beastes liuer that was sacrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, hauing all things ready for preparation of this iourney, so as he could not well go backe, he launched into the sea, and hoysed sayle, and sending threescore of his gallies into EGYPT, sayled with the rest vpon the coast of PAMPHYLIA. Where he wanne a battell by sea of the king of PERSIA, ouercomming the gallies of the PHENICIANS and the CILICIANS, & conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into EGYPT. For he had no small thoughtes in his minde, but reached to high enterprises, and determined vtterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mighty king of PERSIA, and specially for that he vnderstood Themistocles was in maruellous credit and reputation amongst the barbarous people, because he had promised the king of PERSIA to lead his armie for him, and to do him notable seruice whensoeuer he should haue occasion to warre with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistocles poyson himselfe, because he despaired that he could not performe that seruice against Greece which he had promised: assuring himselfe that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimon courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with his army all alongst the Ile of CYPRVS, promising himselfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane season, Cimon sent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iuppiter Ammon, to aske him some secret question for no man euer knew neither then nor since, for what cause he had sent them thither, neither did they also bring backe any aunswere. For they were no sooner come thither, but the oracle commanded them straight to returne: saying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this answere, left the oracle, and tooke their iourney backe to the seawardes. Now when they were come againe to the GRECIANS camp, which at that present lay in EGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this world: and reckoning the dayes since his death, with the instant of their aunswere receiued by the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him: they knew straight that darkely he had signified his death vnto them, and that, at that very time he was with the goddes. He dyed at the siege of the citie of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as some report, or else of a hurt he receiued at a skirmish, as other hold opinion. When he dyed, he commanded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their country againe, and in no case to publish his death: which commaundement was so wisely and cunningly handled, that they all came home safe, and not an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once vnderstood any thing of it. So was the army of the GRECIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though himselfe was dead, the space of thirtie dayes; as Phanodemus writeth: But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Captaine that did any notable thing worthy of fame against the barbarous people, because the Orator Oratours & gouernours of the chiefest cities of GREECE stirred them vp one against an other, and there was no man that would once step in as a mediatour to make peace betweene them. And thus the GRECIANS now did one destroy and spoyle an other by ciuill warre amongst themselues: which happely gaue the king of PERSIA leasure and time to restore himselfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such vtter ruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GREECE, as no toung can well expresse. Indeede a long time after, king Agesilaus came with an armie of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and began a small warre against the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIA ES gouernours of the lower coũtryes of ASIA. But before he could do any notable exploit, he was called home againe by occasion of new troubles and ciuill warres rising among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his country, leauing the treasurers of the king of PERSIA, raising of subsidies and taxes vpon the cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they neuer saw any of the kings sergeants at armes, or commissioner, that brought any letters pattents or commaundement from the king, or any souldier that durst come neare the sea, by fortie furlongs. The tombes which they call vnto this present day Cimonia, do witnesse that his ashes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuertheless, they of the citie of CITIVM do honour a certaine tombe, which they say is Cimons tombe: because that in a great dearth and barennes of the earth, they had an oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Oratour Nausicrates writeth it, but to honour and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRECIAN Captaine.

AS for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Consull, & so was Metellus (surnamed Numidicus, because of his cõquest of NVMIDIA) his yncle by the mothers side. His father notwithstanding was conuict of fellony, for robbing the treasure of the state, whilest he was officer: and Cæcilia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchast life. But for Lucullus selfe, before he bare office, or rule in matters of state: the first thing he touched and tooke in hand for the cause of his country was, the accusation of Seruilius the soothsayer (who before had accused his father) for that he also had dealt falsly in his office, and deceaued the common wealth. And this the ROMAINES thought very well handled of him, in somuch as a pretie while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valiant act done by him. For otherwise, though priuatly they had no iust occasion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuse the wicked, and it pleased them as much to see the young men pursue law-breakers in sute, as to see a notable good course of a dogge at a hare. Howbeit there followed such sturre and banding vpon this sute, that some were very sore hurt, and other slaine in the market place: but in fine, Seruilius was cleared and quite dismissed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latin tounge, in somuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which himselfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole historie thereof, and couche it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a ready toung to vtter that he would speake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be seene to do, hauing matters of sute or open audience.

Like tonny fish they be, which swiftly dine and doppe,

But afterwardes also when ye take them out of their common practise and pleadings,

Then are they graueld straight withouten grace or skill, Their eloquence lyes then in dyke, and they themselues be still.

For Lucullus had studied humanitie from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall sciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refresh his wit (after great trouble) he fell to the study of Philosophie, which quickened the contemplatiue part of his soule, and mortified, or at the least betimes bridled the ambitious and actiue part, specially after the dissention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is said, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortensius the Oratour, and Sisenna the historiographer (in iest as it were at the first, but afterwardes it fell to good earnest) that he would write the breuiary of the warres of MARSICVM in verse or prose, in the Latin or Greeke toung, which soeuer fell to his lot: and I thinke his hap was to do it in prose in the Greeke toung, because we finde a litle Greeke storie extant of the warres of the ROMAINES against the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother Marcus Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofes: but the chiefest & most noted proofe among the ROMAINES was this. Himselfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer sue to beare office in the common wealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwayes till he should be chosen, and let his own time passe ouer. This great curtesie to his brother so wanne the peoples harts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his sake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIANS warre, wherein he did many wise and valiant deedes. The cause notwithstanding that moued Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his constancy, and good courteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once wonne him, he euer after employed him continually in his most waightie causes: as in a commission specially, he gaue him to coyne money. For a good deede part of the money that Sylla spent in the warres against king Mithridates, was coyned by Lucullus commandement within the country of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian peeces, and were currant a long time amongst the souldiers, to buy such things as they stood in neede of, and neuer refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS the stronger by land, but the weaker by sea, so as his enemies cut off his victuals from him: sent Lucullus into EGYPT and LYBIA to bring him such shippes as he found in those parts. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he spared not to sayle with three brigantines of GREECE, and many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himselfe not onely to the danger of the sea in so long a voyage, but of his enemies in like maner: who knowing themselues to be the stronger went sayling euery where with a great nauie. But for all these dangers, he first arriued in the Ile of CRETA, & wanne their good wils. From thence went to the citie of CYRENE, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with ciuill warres, and continuall oppressions of tyrants: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them lawes to establish gouernment amongst them, putting them in remembrance of Platoes words spoken to their auncesters in olde time, in the spirite of a prophecie. For when they praied Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them some forme of gouernment for their commonwealth, he made them answere: it was a hard thing to giue lawes to so riche and fortunate people as they were. For to say truely, as nothing is harder to be ruled, then a rich man: so contrarily, nothing readier to receiue counsell and gouernment, then a man in aduersitie. This lesson framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coasted towardes EGYPT, where he lost the more parte of his ships by pyrates: but for his owne person, scaping their hands, he was very honorably receiued in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kings armie came to meete him at sea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the king when he returned from any voyage by sea: and king Ptolomy himselfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honourable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his courte, and defraied his ordinarie diet, where neuer strange Captaine was lodged before: and did not onely spend the ordinary allowance in feasting of him which he vsed vnto others, but commanded foure times as much prouision more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus tooke no more then reasonable was for his person: nor yet would he receiue any maner of gift, although the king had sent him presents to the value of fourescore talents. And which more is, would not so much as go see the citie of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull sights in EGYPT, saying: that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleasure, and had leisure withall, to see such things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the fielde, at the siege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomy would in no case fall in friendship with Sylla, fearing least he should thereby put himselfe into warres: but gaue him men and ships to bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was ready to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich emerode set in golde, which Lucullus at the first refused, vntill the king shewed him his picture grauen in it: and then accepted the gift, fearing least the vtter refusall might cause the king thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambush by sea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of ships rogebeer of the porte townes thereabouts, ouer and besides such as the Pyrates and sea-rouers had ridden, being parte of their spoiles, and bestowed with their receitors, went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderstood that his enemies laye close in certaine creekes vnder the mayneland, watching to bourde him as he sailed by. Whereupon he vnrigged and bestowed his ships in docks, and sent word to all the port townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him victuals and other necessarie munition to be in readinesse against the spring. But in the meane while, when he saw time conuenient, he put his whole fleete againe to the sea with all possible speede, went himselfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe saile, but in the night packt on all the cloath he could for: so that by this craftie fetche, he wanne RHODES, and lost not one ship. The RHODIANS they also furnished him with ships: and besides them, he so perswaded the GNIDIANS and other inhabitants of the Ile of CO, that they forsooke king Mithridates, and went to make wats with him against them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus himselfe alone draue king Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS againe to libertie: and tooke Epigonus the tyrant prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Nowe about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forsake the citie of PERGAMVM, and to retire to the citie PITANE, in the which Fimbria kept him besieged very straightly by lande. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the sea open vpon him, sent for his force and Naule out of all partes, not daring to hazard battell against Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreouer was himselfe a conqueror. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates meant, and hauing no power by sea of his owne, sent straight to Lucullus to requeste him to come with his nauie into those partes to his aide, for the ouercomming of this king, the greatest and most mightie enemie that euer the ROMAINE people had. Because that so notable a prey, which they had gained with such danger and trouble, should not escape the ROMAINES, while they had him in their hands, and was come himselfe within their daunger: and that therefore he should so much the more hearken vnto it, because that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man should winne more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had stopped his passage, and laide hands on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betweene them both: the one that had driuen him from land, and the other that had stopped his passage by sea. And furthermore, that the ROMAINES would nothing regarde all the famous battels and victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHÆRONEA and ORCHOMENE: in comparison of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes message sent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleeued him at that time (& haue gone thither with his ships to stop the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was besieged, considering also that he was so neere at hand) this warre had taken end there, and the worlde besides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus postponed the consideration and respect he had vnto Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, before all other due regarde of priuate or common benefit: or that he detested and abhorred Fimbria as a cursed person, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his handes in the bloud of his Captaine: or else, that it was through the secret prouidence and permission of the gods, that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reserued as a worthy enemy, against whom he might afterwardes shew his valure. Howsoeuer it was, it so fell out that he hearkened not vnto Fimbriaes message, but gaue Mithridates time and leisure to flie, and finally to scorne all Fimbriaes force and power. But Lucullus selfe also afterwards ouercame the kings armie by sea, once neere vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coast of TROADE: and an other time neere vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by sea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of shippes then he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had discried him, he sailed before all his fleete being Admirall, in a galley of the RHODES, at fiue ores to a bancke, whereof one Demagoras was maister, a man well affected to the seruice of the ROMAINES, and very skilfull in fight by sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other side rowed against him with great force, commanding his pylot that he should so order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the kings galley which was very strong and heauie, and furthermore well armed with pointes and spurres of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his galley to winde about, & turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at that end, receiued the blowe without considering that they hit vpon the dead workes, and those partes which are alwaies aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other ships were come, who commanding his men to turne the beakehead of his galley forward, did many famous actes: so that he made his enemies flie, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to seeke out euen as he was ready to passe ouer the seas, about CHERRONESVS: holpe him to waft armie, and so passed him ouer with safetie. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and king Mithridates was come into his realme and countries againe, which lie vpon the sea ior: Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the summe of twenty thousand for a fine, by reason of their rebellion. And for leauying of this fine, left Lucullus there commission to coine money: which was a great comforte and hearts ease vnto the ASIA, considering the extremitie that Sylla had vsed towards them. For in so grieuous odious a commission vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not onely behaue himself rightly and iustly, but also very honorably and courteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were onely in armes against him, he was very willing they should know that and that for satisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue naughtinesse, he went against them, and hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled to keepe within their walles, and laide siege vnto their citie, where he vsed his policie them. At noone dayes he launched into the sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, towards the citie of Elea: howbeit in the night time secretly returned backe, and making no noise, laide an ambush neere vnto the citie. The Mitylenians mistrusting nothing, went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watch or ward, to spoile the camp of the Romaines, supposing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus coming sodainly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, slue about fiue hundred such as resisted, and wanne sixe thousand slaues, with an infinite quantitie of other spoile. Now did the goddes happely preserue Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles, which Sylla and Marius made poore Italie suffer, euen then when he was occupied in the warres of Asia: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and fauor with Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For as we haue said before, he dedicated his commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his last will and testament appointed him Tutor vnto his sonne, leauing Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, because they were both young men, and vehemently desirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consull with Marcus Cotta, about the three score Olympiade: and then they began to reuiue the matter againe, that it was very needfull to make warres against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only slept for a while. Wherefore, when the Consuls came to drawe lots what prouinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was maruellous sorie that the prouince of Gavle, lying betweene the Alpes and Italie, fell to his lot: because he thought it no countrie wherein any great exploits were to be done: and againe, the glory of Pompey grieued him greatly, whose honor daily increased by the famous battels he wanne in Spaine. So that it was most certaine, that so soone as Pompey had ended the warres there, they would haue chosen him generall in the wars against Mithridates. Wherfore, when Pompey sent to Rome in earnest maner, to require money to make pay to his souldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not send him money the sooner, he would leaue Sertorius there, Spaine behinde him, and bring his army back into Italie: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickly sent him, fearing least he should returne into Italie vpon any occasion, while he was Consull. For he thought that if he returned againe to Rome with so great an armie, he would easily do what him list: and rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the swaye and rule at Rome, because he spake and did all that pleased the common people, being a vitious liuer, and dissolutely giuen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was an other common Orator among the people called Lucius Quintius, and he would haue had all Syllaes ordinances reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of Rome againe with ciuill dissention, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall a part to perswade him, and openly reuoked him with such words, that he was disswaded from his euill purpose, and by reason did hide his rash ambition, handling it both wisely and as cunningly as he could possible (for the safetie of the commonwealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to growe. While these things were thus in hand, newes came that Antiochus the gouernor of Cilicia was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselues to sue for this charge, and to court Cethegus, as the only man who aboue all other might appoint any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus he made no great reckning of the gouernment of Cilicia in respect of the countrie, but because Cappadocia was his next adioyning to it, and perswading himselfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment there-of they would giue none other (but himselfe) the authoritie to make wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none should haue it but himselfe. And hauing prooued sundry wayes, was compelled in the end, against his owne nature, to vse a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deuise to obtaine his desire. There was a woman in Rome at that time called Præcia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant grace in talke and discourse, howbeit otherwise a meere after curtisan maner. But because she emploied the credit and fauor of them that frequented her companie, to the benefit and seruice of the commonwealth, and of them that

loued her: she wanne the reporte (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterprise, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the commonwealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her sight: then had she all the whole power & authority of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Precia would will him to. Thus Lucullus sought to come in fauour with her, sending her many presents, and vsing all other courtesies he could offer vnto her: besides that it seemed a great reward for so proude and ambitious a woman as she, to be sued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all assemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA, who after it was once granted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Precia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholly of themselues with one consent did grant him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, because he knew better how to ouercome him, then any other Captaine, and because that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellus also growne too olde, both which two were the onely men that could deseruedly have contended for this office with him. Neuertheless, Marcus Cotta his fellow Consul, made such sute to the Senate, that they sent him also with an armie by sea, to keepe the coasts of PONTIDE, and to defend the countrie of BITHYNIA. Thus, Lucullus hauing his commission went into ASIA with one legion only, the which he leauied a new at ROME: & when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through couetousnesse and delicacie of the countrie. For amongst others, were the bandes which they called the Fimbrian bandes, men giuen ouer to their owne will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall discipline, because they had liued a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe souldiers that together with Fimbria, slue their generall Flaccus, Consull of the ROMAINE people, and that afterwards betraied Fimbria himselfe, and forsooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being murtherers, traitors, and wicked people: howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painefull souldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldnesse meetely well, and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall ment, that knew how to command: but were vsed to flattering leaders, that commaunded the souldiers no more then they themselues liked of. Now concerning the state of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bolde (as these florishing Sophisters commonly are) vndertaking warre against the ROMAINES, with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the eye: but after that he was once foiled and ouercome, with no lesse shame then losse, when he came to make this second warre, he cut off all superfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to serue for warres at all assayes. For he put by the confused multitude of sundry nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in so many sundry tongues, and clearely banisht also the riche grauen armors with goldesmiths worke, and those with pretious stones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wanne them, then gaue strēgth or courage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMAIN fashion, and great heauy shields, & brought to the field a marueilous number of horse, more ready for seruice, then riche in furniture. Then he ioyned sixe score thousand footmen together, appointed & set in order like vnto the battell of the ROMAINES, with sixteene thousand horse of seruice, besides those that drue his armed cartes with hookes about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And besides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of shippes and gallies together, which were not decked with goodly golden pauilions, as at the first, neither with stooues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and gentlewomen: but furnished full of armour, artillerie, and slings, and with money also to pay the souldiers. With all this armie and preparation, he went first to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, and not those onely, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into the former miseries and diseases, by the cruelty of the ROMAINE farmers and vsurers, who raising rates and impostes vppon them, made them abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the Harpyæ, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he vsed vnto them and qualified a litle the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being busie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Consull (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered him to doe notable seruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from sundrie places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and comming towards him: yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumphe assured alreadie in his hands, and because Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he aduaunced forwardes to giue battell. But Mithridates ouercame him both by sea and by lande: so that Cotta by sea lost three score of his ships with all the men in them, foure thousand footmen by lande, and was after with shame shut vp and besieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelesse to escape, but by Lucullus only aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leaue Cotta, and to go further, assuring him that he should finde the realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: so that he might easily be Lord of the whole. And these were the words of the souldiers that spighted Cotta, because his foolish rashnesse and fonde imagination had not only brought those men to the shambles to be slaine and cast away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them also, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to go to his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration vnto them, aunswered, that he had rather saue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus, (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in BOEOTIA in the first warres against Sylla, and now in this second warre tooke part with the ROMAINES) assured him that so soone as they saw him in the realme of PONTVS, they would all rise against Mithridates, and yeelde themselues vnto him: Lucullus aunswered him thus, that he would not shew himselfe more fearefull, then the good hunters which neuer suffer the beast to recouer his denne. And when he had so said, he marched with his armie towardes Mithridates, hauing in all his campe nine thousand footmen, and two thousand fiue hundred horse. When he came so neere vnto his enemies, that he might easily at eye discerne all their hoast, he wondered at the great multitude of souldiers that were in their campe, and was in minde to giue battell, supposing that the better way was to prolong time, and drawe these warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMAINE captain, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates with certaine number of souldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in a readinesse to fight. But euen as both battels were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the sodaine, without any shewe of change of weather discerned before, and they plainly saw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and shape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten siluer. This celestiall signe put both the armies in such a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroake: and this wonderfull sight fortuned (as it appeared) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Nowe Lucullus afterwards considering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall so many thousands of people as Mithridates had in his campe long time together, hauing his enemies campe so lying before them: willed that one of the prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the prisoner had aunswered to all his demandes, he returned him to prison, and sent for an other: and for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of men the same should maintaine: he found that all would be spent in three or foure daies at the vtmost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of battell. So he caused a maruellous deale of wheate to be brought into his campe out of euery quarter, that the same being throughly victualed, he might easily tary the occasion which his enemies necessitie should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, sought which way he might take the city of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowne before with Cottas the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thousand men, and tenne of their shippes. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterprise, Mithridates stale away by night after supper, taking the oportunity of a darke rainie night, and marched thitherwards with such speede, that he was before the city of CYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastia standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall destinie. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight wayes steppe by steppe, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in disorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiously seated also vppon the high wayes, and through-fare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherfore Lucullus wisely foreseeing what would follow: would not keep his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of assured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would giue victorie into their hands, and that without losse of one droppe of bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates enuironned the GRECIANS round about by land, hauing deuided his armie into tenne campes, and stopped vp the mouth of the arme of the sea, which deuideth the citie from firme lande, with his ships from one side to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were valiant men, and determined to abide all extreamitie for the ROMAINES sakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe stood in such a place, where they might easily discerne it from the citie. But Mithridates souldiers deceiued them, for shewing them the ROMAINES campe that lay aboue hard by them, said vnto them: do yee see yonder campe there? They are the MEDES and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath sent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the CYZICENIANS in a maruellous feare, seeing such a multitude of enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus sent vnto them, but they would not beleeue him at the first, taking it for a tale, only to make them be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the siege: vntill such time as a litle boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had taken him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whome they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they iested to aske that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMAINES campe with his finger: then they beleeued it indeed, & were couragious againe. There is a lake neere vnto the citie of CYZICVS called Dascylitide, & is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in a carte, and so caried it to the sea, and there put as many souldiers in her as she could well carry, who by night entred into the citie, the skoute of the enemies neuer descrying them. This small supply did maruellously comfort the besieged CYZICENIANS: and it seemeth that the gods, delighting to see their noble courage, would further increase and assure the same, by many manifest tokens which they sent from heauen, and specially by one which was this. The day of the feast of Proserpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a black cowe to offer in solemne sacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: so they made one of paste, and brought it hard vnto the aulter. Now, the cowe that was vowed to this sacrifice, & which they reserued vp of purpose to serue for that day, was feeding amongst the heard of the citie in the fields, on the other side of the arme of the sea. But that day she kept alone from all the rest of the heard, and swam ouer the arme of the sea, and came into the citie: where she went of her selfe vnto the place of the sacrifice. Furthermore, the goddesse Proserpina her selfe appeared vnto Aristagoras in his dreame, secretary of the state and commonwealth of the CYZICENIANS, and said vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LIBYA, against the trumpet of Pont, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning morning when the ſecretary had told them his viſion, the CYZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddeſſes words, and could not imagine what they ment. Howbeit at the breake of day there roſe a great whiſtling wind, that made the ſea billowes riſe very high: and the kings engines of battery which were brought to the walles of the city to plucke them downe (being wonderfull works that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuiſed) began to make ſuch a noiſe, and to breake in peeces by the roughnes of the winde, that a man might eaſily iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one inſtant the ſouthwinde was become ſo vehement bigge, that in a moment it burſt all theſe engines a ſunder, and ſpecially a tower of wodde of the height of a hundred cubittes, which the winde ſhooke ſo vehemently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is ſayd furthermore, that in the city of ILIVM the goddeſſe Minerua appeared vnto diuerſe in their ſleepe, all in a ſweat, and ſhewing part of her vaile torne, as if ſhe had bene newly returned from giuing aide vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of ILIVM haue a piller yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memory. Now was Mithridates maruellous ſory for the breaking and loſſe of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIANS had eſcaped the danger of aſſault, and of the ſiege in like maner, vntill he truely vnderſtood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be ſuch, as the ſouldiers were compelled to eate mans fleſh, which (his Captaines abuſing him) had for a time kept ſecret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth in deed, he left off his vaine ambition obſtinately to continue ſiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not warres with threats and bravery, but (as the common prouerbe ſayth) leapt on his belly with both his feete, that is to ſay, he did what he could poſſible to cut off all the victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to aſſault a caſtell that troubled him very neare vnto his campe: Mithridates becauſe he would not loſe that oportunity, ſent the moſt part of his horſemen to get victuals in BITHYNIA, with all his cartes, and beaſtes of cariage, and his moſt vnprofitable footemen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the ſelfe ſame night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter ſeaſon, followed them by the tracke with ten enſignes of footemen only and all his horſemen. But the ſnow was ſo deepe, the cold ſo terrible ſharpe, and the weather ſo rough, that many of his ſouldiers not being able to abide it, dyed by the way. For all that he marched on ſtill, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of Rindacus, where he gaue them ſuch an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the city of APOLLONIA, and went to ſteale the victuals they had loden, and ſtrip the dead, which were a maruellous great number, as a man may iudge in ſuch a caſe: and neuertheleſſe there were taken ſixe thouſand horſe of ſeruice, an infinite number of beaſtes for cariage, and fifteene thouſand men beſides, all which ſpoile he brought to his campe, and paſſed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the hiſtoriographer Saluſt, who writing of this matter ſayth, that here was the firſt time that euer the ROMAINES ſaw any camels. Me thinks it ſtraunge how he ſhould thinke ſo, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the great vnder Scipio, and the others that a litle before had fought againſt Archelaus, neare vnto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHÆRONEA, ſhould not haue ſeene camels. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, reſolued with him ſelfe immediatly to flie, with all the ſpeede he could poſſibly make: and to entertaine and ſtay Lucullus for a time behinde him, determined to ſend Ariſtonicus his Admirall with his army by ſea, into the ſea of GREECE. But as Ariſtonicus was ready to hoiſe ſaile, his own men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the handes of Lucullus, with tenne thouſand crownes which he carried with him, to corrupt if he could part of the ROMAINES army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by ſea, leauing the reſt of his army by land in the handes of his Captaines, to bee brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of Granicus, where he ſet vppon them, and after he had ſlaine twenty thouſand of them, tooke an infinite number priſoners. And they ſay there died in that warres, what ſouldiers, what ſlaues, what lackeis, and other ſtragglers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred thouſand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the city of CYZICVS, where after hee had ſpent ſome daies, enioying the glory due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visite the coast of HELLESPONT, to get ships together, and to prepare an army by sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he slept in the night, it seemed to him he saw the goddesse appeare before him, which saied these verses vnto him.

O Lion fierce and stoute: why sleepest thou so sound?
Since at thy hand so faire a prey, is ready to be sound.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told him the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came some vnto him from the city of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene gallies of king Mithridates, hauing fiue oares to euery banck, that were seen in the hauen of the ACHAIANS, and that sailed towardes the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ship straight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his first comming he slue the Captaine called Isidorus, and went afterwardes to the other mariners that lay at ancker on the coast side, who seeing him come, drew towardes land with their shippes, in purpose to runne them all a shore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus souldiers, because they couldnot compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had laied their shippes was such, as there was no way to force them before, their gallies floting in the sea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much a do all this notwithstanding, found meanes in the end to put a shore certaine of the best souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily land. These souldiers went straight and set vpon the enemies behinde, slue some of them euen at their first comming, and compelled the rest to cut a sunder the cables that fastned the gallies to the banckes. But when they thought to flie from land, the gallies bruised and brake one another: and that worst of all was, ranne vpon the pointes and spurres of Lucullus gallies. And so many of them that stoode aboue hatches were slaine, the rest taken prisoners: amongest whom, Marius the ROMAINE Captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eie, and Lucullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eie, because Marius should not die so happy a death, as to be slaine, but that he should die some shamefull death, and bee condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in person with all the speede he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to finde him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Voconius should haue stayed him: for he had sent this Voconius before with a certaine number of shippes vnto the city of NICOMEDIA, to stay him from flying. But he taried so long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA sacrificing to the goddes of the same, and to be receiued into the fraternity of their religion, that he could neuer after come neare Mithridates to stoppe him from flying: hauing already made sayle with all his whole fleete, and hasting with all possible speede to recouer the realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in sayling thitherwardes, he met with such a terrible storme, that caried part of his shippes so away, that they ranne straggling to seeke their fortune, and part of them splitted and drowned outright: so that all the coasts and ouers thereabouts, for many daies after, were full of dead bodies and shippewrackes cast shore by waues of the sea. Now for Mithridates owne person, he was in a ship of great bulden, the which for her greatnesse could not saile neare the shore, nor recouer land, sheeshe also very euill to be guided by the pilots in so boisterous a storme: the mariners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge: and the shippe her selfe moreouer tooke in such store of water, and was so heauily charged withall, that they durst no more put her out to the sea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to goe abord a litle pinase of pyrates, and to put him selfe and his life into their handes, by whose helpe in the end, (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to land, and recouered the city of HERACLEA in the realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauery Lucullus shewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the goddes. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of these warres to prepare a great nauy of shippes, and therewithall had giuen order also for three thousand talents: Lucullus staied them by letters that they should not doe it, writing brauely vnto them, that without all this charge charge and great preparation he would be ſtrong enough to driue Mithridates from the ſea, with the onely ſhippes hee would borrow of their friends and confederates. And in deede, through the ſpeciall fauour of the goddes, he brought it ſo to paſſe: for they ſay, that this terrible ſtorme that deſtroied the army of Mithridates was raiſed vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the realme of PONTVS, becauſe they had deſtroyed her temple in the city of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuerſe that counſelled Lucullus to deferre the reſt of this warre, vntill an other ſeaſon: but notwithſtanding all their perſwaſions, he went through the country of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the firſt beginning he lacked victuals, ſo that there were thirty thouſand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a buſhell of wheate on their ſhoulders: howbeit entring farther into the countrey, and conquering the whole, there was ſuch exceeding plenty of all things, that an Oxe was ſold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a ſlaue at foure times as much. And of all other ſpoile there was ſuch great ſtore, that either they made no reckonning of it, or elſe they made hauocke of it, becauſe there was no man to ſell it vnto, euery man hauing ſo much of his owne. For they ranne ouer all the countrey vnto the city of THEMISCYRA, and to the vallies that lay vpon the riuer of Thermodon, and ſtayed no where longer then they were a ſpoyling. Thereupon the ſouldiers beganne to murmur at Lucullus, becauſe he aſſured all the cities vpon compoſition, and neuer tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich them ſelues by ſpoile: and yet ſayd they, he would make vs now go farther, and leaue AMISVS a great rich city which we might eaſily take by force, if it were but a litle ſtraightly beſieged, and leade vs into the deſerts of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDÆIANS to fight againſt Mithridates. Lucullus paſſed ouer all theſe complaints, and made no reckonning of them, becauſe he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into ſuch mutiny and fury, as afterwardes they did: and contrarily excuſed him ſelfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckoning, and ſuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather a new force and army together at his pleaſure. For, ſaid he, that is the matke I ſhotte at, and that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I doe, without doing nothing more, then that he might once againe make himſelfe ſtrong, and bring a ſecond army to the field, that might embolden him to come eſtſoones to the fight with vs, and not runne away no more. Doe you not ſee, ſayed he, that at his backe he hath an infinite number of deſert countries, where it is vnpoſſible euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him alſo the mount Caucaſus, and many other vnpaſſable places, which are ſufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings beſides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a litle way from the country of the CAZIRENIANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whoſe power is ſo great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth whole townes and cities of GREECE vnto the realme of MEDIA, who hath all SYRIA and PALESTINE in his handes, and hath ſlaine and rooted out the kings and ſucceſſors of the great Seleucus, and hath caried away their wiues and daughters priſoners by force. This great and mighty king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he maried Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates ſhall come and intreate him to helpe him in his diſtreſſe, that Tigranes will refuſe him, but rather we muſt thinke certainely that he will make wars vpon vs in his defence. Wherefore thus, in making haſt to driue out Mithridates, we ſhall bring our ſelues into great daunger, to prouoke a new enemy, euen Tigranes againſt vs, who of long time hath lurked for a iuſt occaſion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honeſter cauſe to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and ſo neare a kinſeman, from vtter deſtruction, and one that is compelled to ſeeke vpon him for ſuccour. What neede we then to prouoke him to ſecure it, and teach Mithridates (which he purpoſeth not) to whom he ſhould repaire for helpe, to make warres againſt our ſelues, and pricke him forward, or to ſay better, put him with their owne hands into the way to go ſeeke aide of Tigranes: which of him ſelfe he will neuer doe, (thinking it a diſhonor vnto him) vnleſſe we driue him to it for very neceſſity. Is it not better for vs to giue him leyſure and time, to gather a ſecond force againe of him ſelfe, and Mithridates camped at Cabira. Afterwardes when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the siege, and him self with the rest of his army went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of CABIRA, determining to tary the ROMAINES comming, hauing gathered toge-Lycus fl. which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed ouer the riuer of Lycus, and went and presented battell to the ROMAINES in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, but the ROMAINS had the worse: for there was one Pomponius a ROMANE taken, of great estimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if he sauing his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his seruant and friend. Straight re-hurt. And as for Lucullus, he was afraied to come into the plaine, because his enemy was the stronger of horsemen: and he doubted also on the other side to take his way by the mountains, because it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woddes and forrestes. But as he stood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chaunce that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promised Lu- cullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a sure strōg place to lodge his campe, where was a castell aboue the city of CABIRA. Lucullus beleeued the olde mans wordes, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in his campe, and went his way: and after they had passed certaine straight and daungerous waies of the mountaine, he came in the morning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promised to bring him. Now his enemies were maruellously amazed when day light came, to see him there ouer them, in a place where if he list to fight, he might come vpon them with aduantage: and if he liked not to sturre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stoode indifferent then to hazard battell or not. But in the meane season, they say certaine of the kings campe by chaunce were a hunting the Hart. The ROMAINS perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them of by the way: and they beganne by this meanes one to charge an other in such sort, reliefe growing still on either side, as Mithridates, men grew the stronger. But the ROMAINS seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in such a rage, that they all ranne in a choller to Lu- cullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and giue them a signall to fight. Lucullus, be-him selfe in person went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the first of his men he met withall flying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chase, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwardes vppon this returne againe to his campe, he

The Dardarians what people they be. RIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vppon the marishes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his person, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to doe any great enterprise as any that was in all the army, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in company, knowing how to fashion him selfe with all men. This prince, being alwaies at strife with other Lords of his countrey, and contending who should haue the first place of honor and fauor about the king: went vnto Mithridates and promised him that he would do him notable seruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus.
The king was very glad of this promise, & praised him maruellously in secret: howbeit openly of purpose he did him many iniuries, because he might haue some colour to counterfaite anger and displeasure, and to giue way for him to goe yeelde him selfe vnto Lucullus as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, because he was one of the chiefest men of name in all his campe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly: in the which he behaued him selfe so well, that Lucullus greatly esteemed his wisedome, and commended his diligence, in such sort that he did him this honor, to call him sometimes vnto the councell, and make him sit at his borde. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occasion to execute his enterprise, he commaunded his footemen to be ready with his horse out of the trenches of the campe: and at noone daies when the souldiers tooke rest, and slept here and there in the came, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no body there to keepe him from comming in, considering the familiarity Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and sure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if sleepe that casteth away so many other Captaines, had not at that time preserued and saued Lucullus that slept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the dore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of sleepe, was but then newly layed downe to rest. Olthacus whatsoeuer the other said to him, would not be so answered, but told him he would come in whether he would or not, for he must needs speake with him in a matter of great importaunce. Menedemus answered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importaunce, nor more necessary, then the preseruation of his maisters life and health, who had neede to take rest: and with these words, he thrust him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraied then, and withdrew him selfe secretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horse backe, and rode straight to Mithridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and oportunity of time, euen in great matters deliuereth meanes, to saue or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines giuen vnto the sicke and diseased persons. Shortly after, Lucullus sent one of his Captaines called Sornatius to get victuals, with tenne ensignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his taile one of his Captaines also, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and slue him with great slaughter of his men beside. And afterwardes Lucullus sent an other of his Lieutenants called Adrianus with a great company of souldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he should neede. Mithridates did not let slippe this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines also called Menemachus and Myron, with great number of men, as well footemen as horsemen: all which were slaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which hee sought to saue as well as he could, saying that the losse was much lesse then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and rashnes of his Lieutenaunts. But Adrianus at his returne, passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiesty, carying a huge number of carts laden with corne and spoiles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates selfe into so great a despaire, and all his people into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remoue his place. Whereupon, the nobility and such as had place of credit about him, beganne to send their stuffe, and secretly to conuay their stuffe out of the campe, but vtterly prohibiting others to do the same. The rest of the souldiers seeing the stoutnesse of the kinges minions, beganne to runne vpon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once to issue out of the campe. This mutiny grew to such a fury, that they ouerthrew their cariages and sumpter mules, and slue them presently downe. Amongst others there was slaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefest Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermæus the Priest of the sacrifices was troden vnder foote, and smoothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great disorder. The king him selfe amongst others fled, but hauing neuer a one of his guard about him, nor any of the quiries of his stable to bring him a horse: Ptolomy, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne horse, and gaue him the king, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMAINES that followed him were euen euen hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of speede they missed the taking of him, for they were very neare him: but the couetousnes of the souldiers was the losse of the pray they had so long sought for, with so great paine and hazard of battels, and depriued Lucullus of the honor and reward of all his victories. For they were so neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moiles that caried his gold and siluer (whether by chaunce, or of pretended policy of Mithridates, as a matter purposely habandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwixt him that fled, & them MAINES that followed, who stayed there to rob the gold and siluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wanne ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this losse was not all which the couetousnesse of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For, one of the chiefest secretaries of the king being taken, called Callisthenes, whom Lucullus commaunded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fiue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedinesse of them, slue him by the way, and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoile and destroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the citye of CABIRA, and many other castels and strong places, where he found great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the GRECIANS, and many Princes a kin vnto the king himselfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then seeing them selues deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefite of Lucullus, thought with them selues they were not onely taken out of prison, but reuiued and turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates sisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her: because al Mithridates other wiues and sisters whom they placed farthest off, as out of all daunger (and sent into a countrey of greatest safety, neare vnto the city of PHARNACIA) died pittifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sent one of the groomes of his priuy chamber vnto them called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must all die. Amonge many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old a peece, and yet had neuer bene maried: and two of his wiues also whom he had maried, both of the countrey of IONIA, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CHIO, & the other Monime, in the city of MILETVM. Monime, she was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being farre in loue with her, insomuch as he sent her fifteen thousand crowns at one time, yet she would neuer giue eare vnto his sute, vntill such time as the mariage was agreede vppon betweene them, and that he had sent her his Diadeame or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore Lady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a woful life, bewailing continually her accursed beauty, that in stead of a husband, had procured her a maister: and in steade of the matrimoniall company which a noble woman should enioy, had gotten her a gard and garrison of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, farre from the sweete countrey of GREECE: in change whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, hauing vnfortunatly left them within her own country she hapely enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, and had commaunded them from the king to chuse what maner of death they would, and which euery one of them thought most easiest, and least painfull: Monime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her selfe, but the band not being strong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cried out: O cursed and wicked tissue, wilt thou not yet serue me to end my sorrowfull daies? And speaking these words, cast it on the ground and spit vpon it, and held out her throte to Bacchides to be cut a sunder. The other, Berenice, shee tooke a cuppe full of poyson her mother being present, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyson was strong enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not so quickly to destroy the daughter: because she had not taken that proportion which would haue serued her turne, but drue out the pains of her death in length, vntill such time as Bacchides hasting to dispatch her, she in the end did strangle her selfe. As for the kings two sisters, Roxane and Statyra, which were virgines vnmaried, they say, that one of them also dranke poison, cursing & detesting the cruelty of her brother.

brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an euill word, nor was faint hearted or sorowfull to die, but contrarily did commend and thanke her brother highly, that seeing himselfe in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cause them die, before they should fall as slaues into the handes of their enemies, and before they could come to dishonor them, or doe them villany. These pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous & gentle of nature: neuertheless he went on farther, still following Mithridates at the heeles, vnto the citie of TALAVRA. And there vnderstanding that he was fled foure daies before vnto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned backe againe, hauing first subdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARENIANS, taken ARMENIA the lesse, and brought the cities, castles, and strong places vnto his obedience. That done, he sent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes, to summon him to deliuer Mithridates vnto him: and himselfe tooke his iorney towards the city of AMISVS, which was yet besieged. The cause why this siege continued long, was the sufficiencie and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus. who vnderstood so well how all sortes of engines of batterie were to be vsed, and was so subtill besides in all inuentions that might serue to defende a place besieged, as hee troubled the ROMAINES much in this attempt: but afterwardes he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labor, but also outreached by Lucullus for all his fineneſſe. For where before he had alwaies vsed to sound the retreat at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the assault to rest them: one day he brake that order on the sodaine, and comming to assaulte the wall, at the first charge wanne a peece of it, before those within could come in time to resist them. Callimachus seeing that, and knowing it was now vnpossible to keepe the city any longer, forsooke it. But before his departing he set the citie a fire, either for the malice to the ROMAINES, because he would not they should enriche themselues with the sacke of so great a citie: or else for a policie of warre to haue the more leasure to saue himselfe, and flie. For no man gaue eye to them that fled by sea, because the flame was so great, that it dispersed it selfe euen to the very wals, and the ROMAINE souldiers, they only prepared to spoile. Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compassion of the citie within, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpose prayed the souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, euery one going after the spoile, making great noise with classhing of harneſſe, and being very loude besides otherwise, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to spoile, hoping thereby to saue the houses from fire, but it fell out cleane contrary. For the soldiers themselues in seeking all about with torches and lincks lighted, to see if any thing were hidden: they set a number of houses a fire. So as Lucullus comming into the citie the next morning, and seeing the great desolation the fire had made, fell of weeping, saying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla said he, desiring to saue the citie of ATHENS, the goddes granted him that fauor that he might do it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and saue this city, fortune thwarting my desire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that caused CORINTHE to be burnt. Neuertheless he did his best endeuor at that time to helpe the poore city againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus selfe before he left the city, made a great number of the houses which were spoiled by fire, to be built vp againe, and curteously receiued all the inhabitauntes that were fled, besides them he placed other GRECIANS there also, that were willing to dwell amongest them, and increased the boundes and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlongs into the countrey. This city was a colony of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire florished, and that they ruled the seas: by reason whereof, many flying the tyranny of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the same. This good happe fell vpon them, that forsaking their owne goodes, they went to possesse and enioy the goodes of other men: but the very citizens of ATHENS it selfe that had escaped from this great desolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and sent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Murena begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus hauing granted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt verie discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in bestowing this prisoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Muræna should take him for a bondman, whereby he should neede afterwardes to make him free. For seeming to make him free, and restore him to libertie: was no more but to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that only, Muræna laide himselfe open to the world, that he had not all the partes a worthy Captaine should haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISVS, he went to visite the cities of ASIA, to the end that whilest he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue some refreshing of lawes and iustice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long time in ASIA, the poore country was so afflicted, and oppressed with so many euils and miseries: as no man liuing would scant beleeue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreame and horrible couetousnes of the farmers, customers, and ROMAINE vsurers did not only deuour it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to sell their goodly young sonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the interest and vsurie of the money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall: & publickly the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the statues of their goddes, & other church iewels: and yet in the end they themselues were also iuged to be bondmen and slaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their daies in miserable seruitude. And yet the worst of all was, the paine they put them to before they were so condemned: for they imprisoned them, set them on the rack, tormented them vpon a litle brasen horse, set them in the stockes, made them stand naked in the greatest heate of summer, and on the ise in the deepest of winter, so as that bondage seemed vnto them a relefe of their miseries, and a rest of their torments. Lucullus founde the cities of ASIA full of such oppressions, but in a short time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he tooke order, they should account for the vsury that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly he cut off all vsuries that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor & vsurer should enioy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And he that ioined vsury with the principall, that is to say, tooke vsury vpon vsury: should lose the whole. So that by this order, all debts were paide in lesse then foure yeares, and the owners lands and reuenues set cleare of all maner paiments. This surcharge of vsuries, came of the twenty thousand talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the countrie of ASIA: the which summe they had payed twise before vnto the farmers and collectors of the ROMAINS, who had raised it, still heaping vsury vpon vsury, to the summe of fixe score thousand talents. Wherefore these collectors and farmers ranne to ROME, and cried out vpon Lucullus, saying that he did them the greatest wrong that could be, and by meanes of money, they procured certaine of the common counsellers to speake against him: which they might easily doe, because they had diuerse of their names in their bookes that dealt in the affaires of the common wealth at ROME. But Lucullus was not onely beloued of those countries who he did good vnto, but was wished for and desired also of others, who thought the countries happy that might haue such a gouernor. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had sent before from TALAPRA vnto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, and whose sister at that time was Lucullus wife: he first tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high country, making him fetch a great compasse about, by many daies iornies spent in vaine: vntil such time as one of his infranchised bondmen that was borne in SYRIA, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong waies they had led him, within few daies past ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and arriued in the city of ANTIOCH, surnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commaundement to abide Tigranes return, who was then in the country of PHENICIA, where he subdued certain cities, & had some other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wanne secretly diuers of the princes and noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, and against their wils, among whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of GORDIÆNA: and promised the aide of Lucullus also to many the cities that sent vnto him, (which had not long before bene subdued and and brought into bondage) to whom neuertheles he gaue in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once sturre, nor alter any thing. For, the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the GRECIANS, and specially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reason of his great prosperitie, was growen to such pride and presumption, that whatsoeuer euen did commonly esteeme best, & make most reckoning of, he would not only haue it, and take it his owne, but also tooke it that all was made for himselfe whatsoeuer: and this great ouerwening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but very litle, and yet with this litle (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downe the power of the PARTHIANS as much as any man that euer was before him. He replenished the country of MESOPOTAMIA with GREEKIAN inhabitantes, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabite there. He made the ARABIANS change their maner of liuing, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as tent dwellers, because they are vagarant people that dwell in no other houses but tentes, which they euer vse to carie with them, and brought them out of their naturall countrie, and made them follow him, vsing them for his commodisie in trade of marchandice. There were euer many kings in his court that waited on him: but amongest others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his person as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whither, they ranne by his stirroppe in their diuises. And when he was set in his chaire of state to giue audience, they stood on their feete about his chaire holding their handes together, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could doe vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their libertie, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and maister, more ready to suffer, then any thing to do. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this tragicall pompe, when audience was giuen him: tolde king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carie king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumphe of Lucullus: & therefore did summon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or else that he proclaimed warres vpon himselfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well enough that Tigranes (although he set a good countenance of the matter openly with a fainte counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes hauing reigned, (or to say better tyrannically gouerned) fiue and twenty yeares space, had neuer heard any bolde or francke speach but that. Notwithstanding, he answered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates: and if the ROMAINES made wars with him, that he would defend himselfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, king of kings, but onely king simply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he sent him goodly rich presentes which he refused. Whereupon the king sent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cuppe only, because the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest againe vnto him, made great hast to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time would neuer once see king Mithridates his so neare kinseman, who by fortune of wars had lost so puissant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder in fenny, marish, and vnholesome grounds, without any honor giuen vnto him, as if he had bene a very prisoner in deede: howbeit then he sent for him honorably, and receiued him with great curtesie. When they were come together in the kings palace, they talked secretly one with an other, and excusing themselues, clearing all suspitions conceiued betweene them, to the great hurt of their seruauntes and friends, whom they burdened with all the occasion of vnkindnes between them: amongst which number Metrodorus the SCEPSIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speach, and one whom Mithridates so much loued and esteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his warres had sent him Ambassador vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him against the ROMAINES. At which time Tigranes said vnto him: but what saiest thou to it Metrodorus: what aduise wilt thou giue me? Metrodorus eyther because he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe. As Ambassador, O king, I would wish you should do it: but as a counsellor, that you should not do it. Tigranes now reported this speech vnto Mithridates, not thinking he would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though in deede he presently put him to death vpon it. Wherevpon Tigranes was heartily sorie, and repented him greatly to haue counselled him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, hauing but one yeare continued Mithridates euill will before conceiued against him. For he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honorably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead bodie of him whom liuing he had betraied. There died in king Tigranes court also an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deserue that mention should be made of him, for the citie of ATHENS sake wherein he was borne: for it is said, that when he was banished out of his country, he fled into the citie SELEVCIA, which standeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. Where the inhabitants of the same praied him to teach them the Art of eloquence in their country, he would not vouchsafe, but answered them proudly: that a platter was too litle to holde a Dolphine in, meaning that their citie was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected & accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieued him so much, that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honorably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neere vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in the countrie. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in ASIA, and had established good lawes among them, he was not careless also of games and pleasant pastimes, but while he was at leisure in the city of EPHESVS, he made many games, feasts, wrestlings, and fence players set the sharpe for ioy of his victorie, delighting all the cities of ASIA with them, the which in recompence therof did institute a solemne feast also in the honor of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuise to giue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambassade, and had tolde Lucullus that he must make wars with Tigranes: Lucullus went backe againe vnto the realme of PONTVS, where he tooke his armie which he had left in garrison, and brought it before the city of SINOPE to lay siege vnto it, or rather to besiege certaine CILICIANS that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they saw Lucullus come against them, they slue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the citie fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertised of it, entred the citie, put eight thousand of the CILICIANS to the sword which he founde there, and restored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserue the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nights dreame that one came to him, and sayd: go a litle farther Lucullus, for Autolycus commeth, who is desirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision meant. It was the selfe same day on the which hee tooke the city of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that escaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vppon the sea side, which the CILICIANS would haue caried away: but they were taken and followed so neere, that they had no leysure to ship it. This statue (as it is reported) was one of the goodliest and notablest workes of Sthenis the Image grauer. And some say that it was the image of Autolycus who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went with THESSALIE with Hercules to go against the AMAZONES, and he was the son of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the shippe in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made shippewracke vppon a rocke on the coast of CHERRONONESVS, where he was cast away: howbeit that he & his mē scaping with all their furniture, came to the city of SINOPE, which he tooke from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they say) of one Syrus the sonne of Apollo, and of the nimphe Sinope Asopus daughter. Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a saying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may giue more credite vnto, then that which signified to vs by dreames. In the meane season he was aduertised that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA, & CILICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counsell, that sithence he was minded to warre with the ROMAINES, he did not vse Mithridates aide in his warres at such time, as when he was in his best strength and force: and that he did not then ioine his power with Mithridates, rather then suffer him to be destroyed and ouerthrowen, and afterwards with a cold hope goe now to begin a new warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselues. While these things passed in this sort, Machares king Mithridates sonne, that kept the realme of BOSPHORVS, sent a crowne of golde vnto Lucullus, of the waight of a thousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first warre, and leauing Sornatius with sixe thousand men to keepe the realme of PONTVS, he departed with twelue thousand footmen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen to goe to the second warres. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him to goe with so small a companie to fight with so many warlike nations, and to put himselfe vnto the hazard of so many thousands of horsemen, in a maruellous large country, and of a wonderfull length, enuironned round about with deepe riuers and mountaines, couered with snow all the yeare through: so that his souldiers, which otherwise were no speciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did stubbornly disobey him. And on the other side the common counsellers at ROME cried out on him continually and openly protested before all the people, that out of one warre he sowed an other, which the common wealth had nothing to doe withall, and that he looked after none other thing but still to raise new occasions of warres, to the end he might alwayes haue armies at his commaundement, & neuer leaue the warres, because he would make himselfe great with the cost and perill of the commonwealth. These crying counsellers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his army with all the possible speed he could, so that he came in few daies vnto the riuer of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough by reason of the winter season: which troubled him maruellously at that present, doubting least it would holde him there a long time in finding out of boats, and making of posts and plancks to build a bridge to passe ouer his armie. But towardes night the water began to fall a litle, and in the night fell so much, that the next morning the riuer was come to her ordinary streame: and moreouer, the countrymen themselues discerning certaine litle Ilands that appeared vnto them in the middest of the water course, and the riuer very calme as a marrish rounde about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing they had neuer seene chance before, as though at his comming the riuer had sodainly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to giue him safe and easie passage. And because he would not loose that oportunity, he passed ouer his army immediatly: and was no sooner on the other side, but he mette with a happy token of good lucke, which was this. On the other side of the riuer, there was a certaine number of kine consecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyond the riuer of Euphrates, do reuerence and honor aboue all the other goddes: and these kine they employ to none other vse, but onely to sacrifice them vnto this goddesse. They wander all about the countrey where they will, without any maner of tying, or shacling otherwise, hauing only the marke of the goddesse, which is a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not easie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great a doe. One of these consecrated kine, after that Lucullus army was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe vppon a rocke which they suppose is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddesse, bowing downe her head, and stretching out her necke, like those that are tied short, as if she had come euen of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as she was. And besides her, he sacrificed a bull also vnto the riuer Euphrates, in token of thankes for his safe passage ouer. Lucullus the first day did nothing but encampe him selfe only, on the other side of the riuer: but the next morning and the other daies following, he went farther into the countrey by the riuer of SOPHENE, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his army. his men would haue had him to haue taken a caſtle by force, where they ſaid was great ſtore of gold and ſiluer: he ſhewed them mount Taurus a farre off, and told them it is that which we muſt rather go to take. As for the things which be in this caſtle, they be kept for them to vanquiſh: and going on ſtill with great forneyes, paſſed ouer the riuer of Tigris, and ſo entred the realme of ARMENIA with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the firſt man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus comming, had no ioy of it: for he cut off his head for his labor. And therefore from thenceforth there durſt no man ſay any thing vnto him, vntill ſuch time as he was at the laſt enuironned round with fire; which Lucullus armie had raiſed about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was ſporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus, in deede were a noble Captaine, if he durſt but tarry Tigranes comming downe in the citie of EPHESVS onely, and how he would ſtraight be out of ASIA, ſo ſoone as he might but heare tell of his comming againſt him with ſo triumphing an armie of ſo many thouſand men. And thus may we ſee, that like as all bodies and braines, are not a like ſtrong nor able to carie much wine: ſo in like caſe, all wits be not reſolute and conſtant, neuer to doe amiſſe, nor to ſwarue from reaſons bands in great proſperitie. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterpriſed to tell him the truth: whoſe boldnes had litle better reward for his newes, then the firſt that was beheaded. For Tigranes ſent him immediatly with three thouſand horſe, and a good number of footemen, commaunding him that he ſhould bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, and that furthermore, he ſhould marche vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus already camped with part of his armie, and the other part comming after, when his skoutes brought him newes of the barbarous Captaines approache: which at the firſt put him in feare, that if the enemy ſhould come and aſſaile them thus ſcattered in companies, and not ranged in battell, and ready to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in diſorder. And therefore he remained within his campe to fortifie the ſame, and ſent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thouſand ſixe hundred horſe, and as many footmen (or a fewe more) as well armed as armed: commaunding him to approach as neere to his enemie as he could without fighting, only to ſtay him there, vntill ſuch time as he heard newes that all his army was come together into his campe. Sextilius went to doe his commaundement, but he was compelled to fight, (though againſt his will) Mithrobarzanes came ſo brauely & luſtily to aſſaile him. So was the battell ſtriken betweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was ſlaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying ſaued themſelues. After this ouerthrow, Tigranes forſooke his great roiall citie of TIGRANOCERTA that he built himſelf, & went to mount Taurus, where he aſſembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would giue him no leiſure to prepare himſelfe, but ſent Murana on the one ſide to cut them off by the way, and to ouerthrow thoſe that were aſſembled about him: and on the other ſide Sextilius to ſtoppe a great company of the ARABIANS that were comming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius ſet vpon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in marueilous euery man. And Murana following king Tigranes at the heeles, ſpied an occaſion to giue the charge as he paſſed a long and narrow vally, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and ſpecially for an army of ſuch a length: and taking the oportunity, ſet vpon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiuing, fled ſtraight vppon it, making all his cariage to be throwen downe into the way before the enemies to ſtay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS ſlaine in this ouerthrow, and moe taken. Thoſe things hauing this ſucceſſe, Lucullus went to the citie of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he beſieged round. In that citie were a marueilous number of GRECIANS that had bene brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people alſo whom they had vſed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the ADIABENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GORDIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whoſe townes and cities Tigranes had deſtroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reaſon whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of golde and ſiluer, of mettels, ſtatues, tables and pictures, becauſe euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lordes) ſtudied to please the king, to enrich and beautifie this city, with all kindes of furniture and ornamentes fit for the ſame. And hereuppon Lucullus ſtraighted the ſiege as much as he could, perſwading him ſelfe selfe that Tigranes would neuer suffer, that it should be taken, but (though he had otherwise determined) yet for very anger would present him battell, thereby to enforce him to raise his siege. And surely he gessed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had disswaded him by expresse letters and messengers that he should in no case hazard battell, and perswaded him rather to cut off the victuals on all sides from the ROMAINES with his horsmen. The selfe same counsell and aduise did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates sent) giue him in his campe, & prayed him very earnestly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROMAINS. Tigranes patiently harkened to their reasons at the first; but when the ARMENIANS were come, and all the force of the country besides, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kings of the MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were come also with all their power, and that on the other side there came a maruellous great host of the ARABIANS that dwel vpon the sea of BABYLON, & a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN sea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbors, besides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuer of Araxes, some comming freely to doe him pleasure, other for their pensions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor in councell, but of assured hope of victory, and of great bragges and barbarous threatnings, so that Taxiles was in great danger of himselfe, because he was against the determination taken in councell for giuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuie the glory of king Tigranes, and therfore did thus disswade him from battell. For which respect Tigranes would not so much as tarry for him, and because also Mithridates should haue no part of the honour of his victory: but went into the fielde with all his great armie, vaunting amongst his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he should fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all the other ROMAINE Captains. Now this brauery was not so fond, nor so farre out of square, but that there was great likelyhood of it when he saw so many sundrie nations about him, so many kings that followed him, so many battelles of armed footmen, and so many thousand of horsemen. For he had in his army of bow-men and slings onely, twenty thousand: fiue and fifty thousand horse-men, whereof seuenteene thousand men of armes, armed from toppe to toe, as Lucullus himselfe wrote vnto the Senate: and a hundreth and fifty thousand armed foot-men, deuided by ensignes and squadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, masons, and such other kind of handy-craftes men, to plaine wayes, to make bridges to passe ouer riuers, to stoppe streames, to cut wood, and to make such kind of workes, of this sort of people, the number of fiue and thirty thousand, who followed in battel ray in the reereward of the army, making their campe seeme farre greater, & by so much the more stronger. When Tigranes shewed on the toppe of mount Taurus, and that they might plainely see his whole army from the city, and that himselfe also might easily discerne Lucullus army that besieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the city were so glad of this sight, that they made wonderfull shouts of ioy, and great clapping of hands, threatning the ROMAINS from their wals, and shewing them the army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time sate in councell to consider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his siege, and goe with his whole armie vndeuided against Tigranes. But others liked not that he should leaue so great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he should raise his siege. Lucullus made them answere, that neither of them both did counsell him well, but both together did counsell him right. Whereupon he deuided his armie, and left Murena at the siege of TIGRANOCERTA with sixe thousand men: and he with foure and twenty cohortes (in the which were not aboue tenne thousand armed foot-men) and all his horse-men, with a thousand bow-men, and slings or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broade field by the riuers side. The ROMAINES seemed but a handful to Tigranes campe, so that for a while Tigranes parasites made but a Maye-game of the to sporte withall. For some mocked them to scorne, other drewe lottes, and played away their parte of the spoyles, as if they had already wonne the field: and euery one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themselues to Tigranes, and besought him euery man for himselfe, that he would giue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would please him to sit by in some place to see the sporte. Tigranes then, because he would shewe that he could be as pleasant as the rest, spake a thing knowen to euery man. If they come as Ambassadours quoth he, they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but fewe. And thus they played vpon the ROMAINS, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time; but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battel. Now the camp of the barbarous people lay on the other side of the riuer toward the East, and by chance the streame of the riuer turned sodainely towards the West, where there was a better ford to passe ouer. Wherfore Lucullus marching with his army by the riuers side, following the streame to meet with some forde, casting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and sayed vnto him, laughing. Doest thou see Taxiles those goodly ROMAINE legions, whom thou praisest to be men so inuincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles answered the king againe. I would your good fortune (O king) might worke some miracle this day: for doubtles it were a strange thing that the ROMAINS should flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpon their armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fieldes: neither doe they carry their shieldes and targets vncased, nor their burganets bare on their heades, as they doe at this present, hauing throwen awaye their leather cases and couerings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we see so bright and glistering in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they march towardes vs. Taxiles had no sooner spoken these words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his ensigne bearer turne sodainly that caried the first Eagle, & the bands tooke their places to passe the riuer in order of battell. Then Tigranes secretly come to himselfe, as out of drunkennes: cried out aloude twise, or thrice, come they then to vs? But then was there no small sturre and tumult, to put such a world of people into battell. The king Tigranes himselfe vndertooke to leade the middle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADIABENIANS, & the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the most part of the compleat armed men, who made the first front of al the battel. But as Lucullus was ready to passe the riuer, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wish him to take heede that he fought not that day, because it was one of those which the ROMAINS thought vnfortunate, and call them Atri, as to say, blacke: for vpon one of those dayes, one Capio was ouerthrown in a set battell with all his army by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue the a prety answer againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (sayd he) for the ROMAINES. It was the sixteenth day of the month of October. And so with those wordes encouraging his men, passed ouer the riuer, and went himselfe the foremost man, and marched directly towardes his enemy, armed with an anima of steele, made with scallop shelles, shining like the sunne, and vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding in his sword drawn in his hand: to let his men vnderstand, that they must sodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the swords poynte, that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with shotte and slings, and that he would so quickely winne the distance of grounde they had to marche ere they could ioyne, that they should haue no leasure to shoote. And furthermore, perceiuing that the strength of their men of armes (whereof they made so great account) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the top whereof was very plaine and euen, and the way vp the hill not passing foure furlongs trauell, and not very hard nor steepe to clime: he sent thither certaine horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commanded them to giue a charge on the flanck to disorder them, and assay to cut their launces, with their swordes. For all the strength of these men of armes consisteth in their launces, and they cannot do nothing for themselues, nor against their enemies, they are so heauily armed and loden so as it seemeth they are locked vp in their armor, as in an iron prison. And he himselfe therewithall taking two ensignes of footmen, stroue also to gaine the toppe of the hill, his souldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable corage, because they saw him the formost man trauelling a foote, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the top, he stayed a litle in the highest place he could finde, and then cryed out with a loude voyce: oh companions, the victory is ours. And as he spake those wordes, he ledde them against these men of armes, commaunding them they should not meddle with throwing their darts, but taking their swords in their hands they should strike at their thighes and legs, becaus because they haue no other partes of their bodies naked. Howbeit there was no neede of such fight, for they taried not the ROMAINS, but with great crying out turned their horse heades immediately, and ranne cowardly (themselues and their horses, heauie armed as they were) through the middest of the bandes of their footemen, before they had stricken a stroke. And thus were so many thousands of men broken without any stroke striken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of blood seene to be spilt. But the greate slaughter was, when they began to flie, or (to say better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ranne so one vpon anothers necke by reason of the maruellous length and bredth of their battelles. Tigranes amongst the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, and seing his sonne running the same fortune, flying as himselfe did, tooke off his diadeame or royall bande from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commaunding him to saue himselfe as well as he could by some other way. But the young prince durst not put it on his head; but gaue it to one of his trusty seruauntes to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: so that amongst the other spoyle and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes diadeame. It is thought that there were slaine at this ouerthrow, aboue a hundreth thousand footmen, and very few of all the horsmen saued. On the ROMAINS side, there were about a hundreth hurt, and fiue slaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a treatise he made of the gods; writeth that the sunne neuer sawe the like ouerthrow. And Strabo another Philosopher in a certaine abridgement he made of stories sayed, that the ROMAINES were ashamed and laughed at thē selues that they had drawen their swordes against such dastardly slaues. And Titus Liuius declareth also, that the ROMAINES were neuer in any battell with so small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in all the world the twentith part (nothing like) of those that were ouercome. Wherefore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the ROMAINES did highly commend Lucullus, because he had ouercome two of the greatest & most mighty princes of the world, by two sundry cōtrary means: the one by tract and delay, and the other by speed and swiftnes. For he vndermined and consumed Mithridates, by holding backe, & delaying, at that time whē al his strēgth was whole: and to the contrary he destroied Tigranes with great speede and haste. And thus did he that, which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vsed delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to win the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battell, thinking still that Lucullus had vsed his wōted policy, to delay and giue backe alwaies: and therfore he came by small iornies vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the first with a few of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he straight mistrusted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them naked, & sore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to seeke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forsaken of his men, & in very poore estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduersity with that pride & disdaine he had vsed him before in his miserie: but lighted off his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, & traine of a kings court that followed him to serue him, comforting him, & exhorting him to pluck vp his hart againe, and to be couragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied afresh the whole force & power they could from all the parts of their dominions. In the meane season, there fell out great seditiō in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betwene the GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon, Lucullus giuing an assault to the citie at that very instant, won it, and seazed vpon the kings treasure there, leauing all the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoile that was won vpō the enemies, eight hūdreth Drachmas vnto euery souldier. And vnderstanding that there were diuerse musitians, common players, minstrels, & such kind of people meete for feastes and sport, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all partes, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this city: he caused all thē to serue at the sportes and feastes of this victory. After the solemnization whereof, he sent the GRECIANS home againe vnto their country, and gaue them money to defray their charges by the way, and the barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their natiue coūtries. And so it fortuned, that by the desolation and destruction of a city forsaken, many others were built gaine, and stored with people: because those cities had therby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe, who euer after did loue and honor Lucullus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iustice, and of clemencie: then that that came by force of martiall prowes and chevalry. For in deedes of armes, he sayed his army partly deserued praise, & fortune also caried the best parte away: but the praise of the other, were onely due vnto himselfe. Wherby he shewed the value of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue: and so reaped the frute of his worthy deserts. For by those good partes, he wanne the hartes of the barbarous people in such sorte, that the kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themselues and their goods into his hands. So did the nation of the SOPHENIANS also yeeld themselues vnto him. The GORDIÆNIANS, in like manner, they liked Lucullus so wel, that they would willingly haue forsake their cities, houses & coūtry, to follow him with their wines and children vpon this occasion. Zarbienus king of these GORDIÆNIANS, as we haue recited before, had priuily entred amity with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no longer away with the tirany of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed vnto Tigranes who put Zarbienus, his wife & children to death, before the ROMAINS maine army came into the coūtry of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but passing through his realme gaue him very roiall funerals, for hauing heaped vp a huge pile of wood, sumptuously set out with cloth of gold and siluer, and other rich spoyles of Tigranes: he himselfe in person, would needs set it a fire, and made the funerall effusions & accustomed sprinklings at burials, with his friendes and kinsmen, doing him this honor, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people, & appointed also a great summe of money besides to erect a sumptuous tombe for him. For they found great store of gold and siluer in the kings castell, and there was plenty of prouision also of three hundreth thousand bushels of wheate: the which did enrich his souldiers maruellously, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that hauing receiued not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at ROME, he had notwithstanding made the warre entertaine it selfe. About the selfe same time also, the king of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors vnto him to offer him his friendship and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambassadors frō him also of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the king of the PARTHIANS stood doubtfull how to resolue which part he should take, and that secretly he sent vnto Tigranes, to aske the realm of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aid him against the ROMAINS. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes & Mithridates, as two enemies wearied & ouercome, & a litle to proue the force & power of the PARTHIANS by making wars vpon thē, thinking it great honor vnto him, if he might discomfit & ouerthrow three so mighty kings one after an other, like a valiant conqueror that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the countries of three of the greatest Princes vnder the sunne, alwayes conqueror, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of PONTVS, that they should repayre to him with all speede with the bandes they had vnder their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the country of GORDIÆNA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenantes that had many times before founde their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commandements, knew plainely then their canckred stomaks & incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or perswasions they could vse but contrarily they cryed out, and tolde them plainly, that they would no longer tary where they were, but would go hom to their coūtry, and leaue the realme of PONTVS without gard or garrison at all. And farther, that worst of all was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they giue a full example of boldnes to his souldiers there, to mutiny in such sorte, hauing goodwill and disposition thereunto of themselues before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with finenes, were become so dull and lasie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnes of warres, but desired to liue in all idlenes and ease. And hearing the reporte of their fellowes stoutnesse, called them lasie ladders, saying, they must needes take the like course, and doe as they taught them, vaunting of their good seruice of long time done, which well deserued leaue now to departe home with safety, and thenceforth take their rest. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, & many other their words worse, & fuller of sedition then these: brake off his enterprise against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the middest of sommer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to see the fields so full of wheate yet standing, which came by the season of the yeare, and coldnes of the aier, being so slacke and slowe in all those partes. Neuertheles, he came down into the valley, and at two or three skirmishes ouerthrew the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his comming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley, and destroied the whole country, without lette or stop of any man, taking away the prouision of corne that was made for Tigranes campe: wherby he straighted his enemies vnto that need and necessity of victuals which himselfe feared, & yet ceased not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell. Sometime enclosing their campe with trēches about, as if he ment to famish them: sometime againe destroying and spoyling the whole coūtry before their face. But because they had so ofte bene discomfited, they would no more stirre, nor once moue against him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raised his campe, & went and layed siege vnto ARTAXATA, the chief city of the kingdō of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wiues and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battell, thē suffer that city to be lost. It is sayed that Hanniball of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochus was ouerthrown in battell by the ROMAINS) went vnto king Artaxes, whō he taught many necessary and profitable things for his realme: & amongst others, considering that one of the goodliest and pleasantest places of all his kingdome lay wast, and no reckoning made of it, drewe a plot of a city, brought the king thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuise maruellous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to see the worke finished. And thus was this noble and famous city built, and called after the kings name, Artaxata, and held euer after the reputation of the chiefest place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertised that Lucullus went to lay siege thereunto, could not endure it, but went with all his army to follow the ROMAINS, and the fourth day came & camped hard by them: insomuch as there was but the riuer of Arsanias betweene them, which the ROMAINS of necessitie must passe ouer to goe to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauing first sacrificed vnto the gods, assuring himselfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his handes: made his armie passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohortes in the fronte, and the other behinde, fearing least the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes should enuironne them at their backes. They had against them also the MARDIAN bowmen a horse backe, & the IBERIANS with their laūces, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best soldiers he had in pay: & yet for all that they did no notable seruice. For when they had skirmished but a litle with the horsemen of the ROMAINES, they durst not tarry the legionaries or footbandes that came behind them, but dispersed themselues, some flying one way, some an other, which intised the ROMAINE horsemen to follow the chase. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes person, saw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to breake vpon the footmen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afrayed thereof: sent in haste to call in his horsmen that followed the chase, and in the meane time himselfe marched foremost, against these Lordes and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the nobility of their hoast, whom he put in such a feare, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the hart so much as to abide the cries of the ROMAINES. The chase was very long: for it cōtinued all night vntil such time as the ROMAINS were wearied with killing, taking of prisoners, and packing vp of all kindes of spoyles. Titus Liuius sayeth, that there were slaine moe men in the first battell: but greater personages in the second: and the chiefest of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus hart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the country, euen vtterly to destroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne, (whē the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that ſeaſon haue thought) there fell out ſo great a cold, that for the moſt part, it did nothing but ſnow: and if the element did any thing cleere, then froſe it ſo hard, that the horſe could come by no water, the riuers were ſo extreamely congealed with iſe. And there could no man paſſe ouer by ford: for they did not ſo ſoone enter, but the iſe brake and cut the veines and ſinewes of the horſe legges aſunder, they were ſo hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the country being full of trees, woods and forreſts, and the wayes very narrowe, not being able to paſſe by the fields, they were through wet with ſnow that fell vpon them: and whē they came to their lodging, then it was worſe, for there they were conſtrained to lye in ſoft & moiſt places. And therefore the ſouldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refuſed to goe any farther. And firſt they ſent their Colonells and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue off this iorney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in troupes, and in the night time beganne to murmur and groyne in their tentes (which is a certaine ſigne and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a minde to rebell againſt their Generall) although that Lucullus vſed all gentle perſwaſions to winne them with patience to abide this iorney, at the leaſt, till time they might take the cittie of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there deſtroy the worke & memory of the greateſt enemy that euer the ROMAINS had in the world, meaning Hanniball. But when he ſaw all this would not preuaile, he brought them backe againe, & paſſed ouer mount Taurus an other way, and came down into the country called MYGDONIA, a very hot and fertile ſoyle, where there is a great cittie, and maruellouſly repleniſhed with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH, of MYGDONIA. In that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes own brother: but for experiēce in engines of battery, and for ſufficiencie and skill in ſuch matters, there was Callimachus alſo, he that maruellouſly troubled Lucullus before at the ſiege of the citie of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this citie beſieged the ſame by all ſuch meanes as might enforce it, and that valiantly, that in very ſhort time he tooke it by aſſault. And as for Gouras, who ſubmitted himſelfe to Lucullus mercie, he was very courteouſly intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him ſpeake, notwithſtāding that he promiſed, if they would ſaue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treaſure hidden, which no man knew but himſelfe onely. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gyues to receiue the puniſhment he had vnto deſerued, for ſetting the city of AMISVS on fire, and taking from him the meane to ſhew the GRECIANS his goodnes, affection and liberalitie towards them. Vntill this preſent time, it might be truly ſayed, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterpriſes and affayres: but from that time forwards, it was quickly ſeene that the fauorable blaſt of fortune failed him, he did all his things with ſo great paine, and all that he did, fell out contrary vnto him, and to very ill purpoſe. Indeede he did euer ſhew the valiancie, patience, and great courage that ſhould be in a valiant Generall, or Lieutenant of an army. But his exploites and doings had neuer after that eaſie grace, nor ſhining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue loſt all that he had wonne before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles & vaine contention he had with his people to no purpoſe. But the worſt was, that they make himſelfe the only author of all theſe euils: becauſe he could not, or would not entertaine the good will of the multitude of his ſouldiers: thinking that whatſoeuer a generall, or any other officer of ſtate or calling doth to pleaſe and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to diſhonor himſelfe, and to giue cauſe vnto his ſouldiers to deſpiſe his authoritie. But that which made moſt againſt him was this: that he gaue no eſtimation to gentlemen, and men of like quality to himſelfe, but diſdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For theſe they ſay were his faultes and imperfections, but otherwiſe that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes & good conditions that could be poſſibly wiſhed for, or deſired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly preſence, well ſpoken, wiſe and diſcreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perſwade the people in peace, as to encourage his ſouldiers in war. Saluſt writeth of him, that his ſouldiers began to miſlike with him, euen from the firſt entry into theſe wars, becauſe he made them lye out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of CIZICVS, and the other before the citie of Amisvs. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them. For either they lay in their enemies countrie, or else if they lay in their friendes, yet he made them campe abroad in the field, and shrowd themselues in their tentes: for Lucullus neuer entred with his armie into any city or confederate towne of Greece. Now if the souldiers of themselues misliked Lucullus, the counsellers at Rome that were his enemies, and enuied his prosperitie and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they continually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this war in length, purposely because he would alwaies haue occasion to rule, & meanes to get, hauing in his hands in maner all Cilicia, Asia, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, Armenia, & all the prouinces & regions as farre as to the riuer of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the Princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sacke and spoyle, and not to destroy & ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors that spake these wordes. It was he also that most moued the people to this order that Lucullus should be called home, & other sent to succeede him in the charge and gouernment of the countries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane, it was also ordained that all they which were vnder his charge, should be dispensed withall for their othes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But besides those, & such like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other euils being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, and hare brainde man. He was Lucullus wiues brother, and she was so light of her bodie, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in Lucullus campe, caried not that estimation and credit he thought himselfe worthy of. For he tooke himselfe equall with the best, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when in deede there were many of farre better desert, he being noted both for a vitious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he beganne for spight to suborne the bands called Fimbrians, and to stirre them vp against Lucullus, sowing sweete and pleasant wordes amongst the souldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consull Flaccus, and choose him in his steede for their Captaine. By reason whereof they gaue good eare to Clodius words, and called him a noble Captaine, and a louer of souldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should neuer see an end of their great paines and warres, but should miserably consume their daies in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and sometime with an other: and that they wandered through all the countries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of so long and painefull seruice, seruing only to gard Lucullus carts & camels loden with gold and vessell of golde and siluer, and other pretious stones. Where the souldiers that had serued vnder Pompey, tooke now their ease at home in their country with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire cities, as rich burgeses and wealthy citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into desert places vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of Asia, but only made a litle warre in Spayne against those that were banished, & in Italie against fugitiue slaues. Shall we then, said he, carie harnesse on our backes all the daies of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntill this present, reserue our selues, our bodies & liues for that noble Captaine, who esteemeth the greatest honor and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his souldiers rich, that serue vnder him? Lucullus armie was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against Tigranes, nor against Mithridates: who went presently out of Armenia into his realme of Pontus, and began to conquer it againe, whilest the Romaine souldiers murining against their General, remained idle in the prouince of Gordiæna, excusing themselues by the winter season, and tarying vntill Pompey or some other Captaine should quickly come to raise the siege, and succeede Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they vnderstoode that Mithridates had ouerthrowen Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went against Sornatius & Triarius: they were then ashamed of themselues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neere, made hast to winne the victory, as if it had beene cocke sure before Lucullus came. And was himselfe ouerthrowen in a great battell, where some say there died aboue seuen thousand Romaines, amongst the which were a hundred and fiftie centurions, & fourteene twentie Captaines or Colloners of a thousand men a peece, and yet besides, Mithridates tooke their campe also. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who bid Triarius, whom the souldiers sought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proued sundry meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once sturre abroad, because he looked for Tigranes that came forward with a mightie power. Whereupon he determined to game to goe against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioyned forces together. But as he was in his iourney towardes him, the Fimbrian bandes began to mislike him, and would not follow his ensignes, saying, and alleaging for themselues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to depart, and were discharged from their othe: and further more that Lucullus had no more to doo to commaund them, considering that the gouernment of the prouinces which he had, was giuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiuing this, did so humble himselfe vnto them, supposing that way to winne them, as there was no kind of vnciuilly humblie but he submitted himselfe vnto it: insomuch as he went into their tentes, to pray and intreate them one after an other, with water in his eyes, and with so great lowlinesse, as came to shake handes with them. But they fiercely reiected all his courtesies & faire intreaties, calling their penniesse purses before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, since he had with the spoile of them all so well enriched himselfe alone. Neuertheless, at the vnfeined instance and earnest request of the other souldiers, these Fimbrian bands were compelled to promise, that they would yet tarry all that sommer, so that if no man in the meane time offred battell, at the end of the tearme, they might goe where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or els to remaine alone, & consequently to forsake the country of the barbarous people. With much a doe thus he kept them together, but in such sort, as he durst no more venter to compell them to come to battell, contenting himselfe that they were willing onely to stay with him, being forced to suffer Tigranes in the meane time to destroy and ouerrun the country of Cappadocia, & Mithridates also to bragge againe, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: insomuch as there came commissioners & deputies from Rome by his owne procurement, to order the state of the realme of Pontus with him, as of a kingdom already won to the Romaine Empire. But when they were come, they found him not master of himselfe, and that his owne souldiers flouted him, and did him all the spight and iniury they could. For they were so vnruly towards their Captaine, and did so much disdaine him, that when the end of the sommer was come, they armed themselues with armor and weapon, and drawing out their swordes in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the fielde: and after they had made their noise and cries accustomed when they ioyned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling and swinging their swords in the aire, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promised Lucullus to tary. On the other side Pompey had written vnto the other souldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauour at Rome, the practises and flatteries of the common counsellers there, he was substituted Generall in Lucullus place. Which much misliked the Senate and nobilitie: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a successour sent, not to succeede him in troubles and dangers, but in honour and glory of triumph. And that they should compell him not onely to resigne vp the office of a Generall to an other, but (for the good seruice he long time had done) the reward of his honour due for the same: and this also more misliked them that were about him. That so soone as Pompey was arriued in Asia, he tooke all power & authority from Lucullus, to punish or reward any man for good or ill seruice done to the common weale in those warres, & did moreouer prohibite by publicke bils set vp in euery common place, that they should no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten commissioners sent to dispose of the state of the prouinces wonne by him, should commaund or ordaine: and because Pompey came with a greater power and armie then his, he was in some feare of him. Their friends thought good neuertheless they should meete together: and so they did incontinent friendly, in a village of GALATIA, where at their first meeting they saluted ech other very curteously, reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, because he had bene Generall of the ROMAINE people in many warres, & had alreadie triumphed twise. The bundels of roddes which the sergeants caried before them, were wreathed about with laurell branches for the victories they had both atcheiued: but Pompeys bundels were withered away, because they had come a long iorney through hotte and dry countries. Lucullus officers seeing theirs withered, courteously gaue them of theirs fresh and new gathered: which Pompeys friendes tooke for a signe of good lucke. For to say truely, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cause of the honor that Pompey afterwards wanne. Howbeit in the end for all their talke, they were no whit the better friends: but departed the one from the other more strange then they met. For Pompey by a plaine edict, brake, reuoked and disanulled all Lucullus ordinances, and taking from him al his other souldiers, left him but only sixteene hundred to accompany his triumph, and yet they followed him with vnwilling minds: such was Lucullus imperfection & mayme, either by nature or frowardnes of fortune, that he lacked the chiefest thing a Generall should haue, which was, to be beloued of his souldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongst many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimitie, wisedom, iudgement, & iustice: the riuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermost confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA side, but it had extended as farre as the sea Hyrcane, yea euē vnto the vtmost part of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lie beyond that, sauing the countrie of PARTHIA, which then was not so great nor strong, as it appeared afterwards in Crassus time: not so ioyned and knit together, but (what through ciuill dissentions amongst them at home, and forreine warres of their neigbours abroad) was so weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themselues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their skinnes. But to take things rightly as they be in deede, me thinkes that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his country by other, then he did benefit the same by himselfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA so neere vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had sacked and spoyled, the great treasure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe also of Tigranes, which was shewed in triumph as a prisoner with the rest: moued Crassus with such a marueilous desire to passe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an assured spoyle, and a purposed prey vnto all those that would come to take them. But Crassus farre other wise, finding him selfe gauled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not so much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wisedome and valiantnes. But that shall be seene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found first of all his brother Marcus accused by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of treasurer in Syllaes time, and by his commaundement, whereof he was cleared by sentence of the iudges. But Memmius of spight turned his anger against Lucullus selfe, stirring vp the people against him, and making them vnderstand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treasure, which should haue come to the common wealth, and that to worke his feate the better, had prolonged these warres as he did: wherefore he perswaded them flatly to deny him the honor of his triumph. And truely Lucullus was in great danger to haue lost it vtterly: but that the noblemen of the citie, and they that were of greatest authoritie, intermedled themselues with the tribes when they came to passe it by voices of the people, whom they intreated so much through suite and perswasion, that in the end, with much a doe, the people suffered him to enter the citie in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, not terrible nor troublesome for the long shewe or sight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For hee caused the shewe-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be set out and furnished chiefely with armour and weapons of the enemies to a marueilous number: and with the kings engines and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleasant sight to behold. And in this shew, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, tenne cartes of warre armed with sythes that passed by, and threescore of the chiefest friendes and Captaines of the two kings that were led prisoners through the citie. And there were also drawen after them, a hundred and tenne gallies all armed in the prores with strong spurres of copper, and a statue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, sixe foote high, with a rich target set with pretious stones. Besides all that, there were twenty cubberds as full of siluer plate as could be, and thirtie cubberds full also of golden vessell, armor and coyne of gold, caried vpon mens shoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beddes, and sixe and fiftie other mules that caried siluer bullion, and a hundred & seuen other mules that caried siluer coyne, amounting to the summe of two hundred threescore and tenne thousande Sestertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of account caried also, wherin were particularly written the summes of money which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre against pyrates on the sea, & vnto the treasurers and high treasures, to put into the sparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwardes in an article by it selfe, that he had giuen nine hundred and fiftie Drachmas to euery souldier by the polle. After the shewe of this triumph was ended, hee made a generall feast, in the which he feasted all the citie and villages thereabouts, which the ROMAINS call Vicos. And afterwardes forsooke his wife Clodia for her vnchast and wanton life, and maried Seruilia Catoes sister: howbeit he wanne nothing by the exchange, for he sped as euill with his second as he did with the first. For, sauing that she was not slandered with the incest of her owne brethren, otherwise she was as dishonest and vnchast as Clodia: and yet he bare with all a while for her brothers sake, but at the length grew wearie of her, and put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filled the Senate with a maruellous hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withstand Pompeys tyrannie, and to vphold and maintaine the authoritie of the nobility and Senate against the people, for that by his noble deedes he had atcheiued so great fame and reputation) he sodainly gaue ouer all dealings in the affaires of the common wealth: either because he sawe it so best, being a hard thing now to keepe it from ruine: or else (as other said) for that he felt himselfe sufficiently furnished with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to liue quietly all at his ease after so great paines, trauelles and troubles, the ende whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And surely some were of his minde, and liked this great change of his maruellous well: because he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill successe and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMBRIS, and after his valiant acts in warres which had won him great honor, yet would he not so leaue of, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnsatiable mind, and ambitious desire to rule and beare sway, (being withall a very old man) went and sorted himselfe amongst young men desirous of gouernment, who brought him not only to commit many outrages, but made himselfe also to suffer greater cruelties. It is thought also that Cicero had ended his aged course more happily, if after he had quenched Catilines conspiracy, he had then taken his ease. And so had Scipio in like case, if when he had ioyned NVMANTIA vnto CARTHAGE, he would then haue quieted himselfe. And therfore, some say, that there is a certaine reuolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wise man should medle any more with the affaires of the cõmon wealth: no more then a man whose youth & strength is gone and dried, is any more fit to iust, wrastle, or enter into such exercises of the bodie. But contrarily, Crassus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, because he gaue himselfe so much to pleasure and pastime: as if to liue pleasantly and delicately did not worse become his age, then to command in armes, or to gouerne the affaires of a common weale. And for my part, reading Lucullus life, me thinkes that I read an ancient comedie, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you find notable exploites done by him in warres, and great good gouernment also in peace: but in the end they all turned into feastes and banquets, and lacking litle of maskes and mummeries, dauncing with torches, and all other such delightes fit for young men. For I bring within the compasse and reckoning of his finenesse and pleasures, his sumptuous buildings, his stately walles and galleries, his hotte-houses and stoues, his tables and pictures, his statues also: and the great workmanshippe and curiositie he had besides of all other chartes by him, gotten together out of all partes to his infinite charge, charge, abusing therein the world of goods and treasure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwise. Insomuch, that notwithstanding excesse and superfluitie hath euer since increased vntill this present time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors haue. And therfore Tubero the Stoike Philosopher, hauing seene these stately works which Lucullus had caused to be made neere vnto NAPLES, by the sea side (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vaults) and great ditches cast by force to make the sea passe and runne through his houses, to keepe fish therein, and lodgings also that he built in the sea it selfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gowneman, as if he would haue saide, Xerxes the ROMAINE. For euen so did Xerxes in old time cause the mountaine Atho to be cut in sunder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his shippes through. He had also many other pleasant places within the territories of ROME neere vnto THVSCVLVM, where there were great large haules set vpon tarrasses to see round about farre off in the day time. And Pompey going thither sometime to see him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a marueilous faire sommer house, but not to be dwelt in the winter season. Lucullus laughing, answered him: do ye thinke me to haue lesse wit & reason then storkes or cranes, that I can not shift houses according to the season? An other time there was a Prætor of ROME, that making plaies to shewe the people pastime, sent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set forth his plaiers: Lucullus made him answere, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demaunding of him how many he should neede, the other answered, that a hundred would serue his turne. Wherupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therefore the Poet Horace writing this story, addeth to a notable exclamation against superfluity, saying: that men thinke that a poore house, where there is no more riches then necessary, and where there is not more then appeareth in sight, and that the master knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinarie seruice at his bord, not onely in that his beddes whereon he sedde, were couered with rich carpetes of purple, and himselfe serued in gold and siluer vessell set with precious stones, & that there was dauncing, musicke, plaies, and other such like pastimes of ordinary: but also for that he was continually serued with all sorts of fine daintie dishes, with workes of pastry, banqueting dishes, and frute curiously wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered at of men of simple vnderstanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey maruellously esteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Phisitian had willed him to eate of a thrush. For when his seruants tolde him they were hard to come by in sommer, but at Lucullus house where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wise they should aske any of him, but saide vnto his Phisitian. What if Lucullus were not giuen to pleasure, could not Pompey liue? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend & kinseman both, and yet he so much misliked his maner of liuing and ordinary expence: that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpose) touching meane diet, sobrietie, and temperance of life: Cato could no longer abide him, but rose vp, and said vnto him. What, wilt thou not leaue babbling to vs all day: thou that art rich as Crassus, that liuest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: neuertheless it is certaine, by the notable sayings they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to liue so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feasted certaine GRECIANS many daies together in his house, that were come out of GREECE to ROME: and that they being men brought vp with the sobrietie and simplicitie of GREECE, after they had bene feasted there diuers times, were ashamed, & refused to goe thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made them this great cheere for their owne sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: my Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that. In deede I must needes grant that there is somewhat more then ordinarie to welcome you withall: but I tell you truely, the most part is for Lucullus sake. An other time when he supped all alone, and his men had laide but one bord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward to know why he was serued so: the steward answered him. My Lord, because I saw you send for no bodie, I thought this supper sufficient. What, said he againe: knewest not thou that Lucullus should suppe to night with himself? In fine, Lucullus fare was cõmonly knowen through Rome, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble housekeeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place seeing him at pleasure: (for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey also, and though there was some iarre betwene them for matters of warres, he did not let for that to come vnto him, and to speake gently one to an other) and Cicero after he had saluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, said he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, said Cicero, Pompey and I will come and suppe with you to night, with condition that you prouide no more then your ordinary. Lucullus told him againe, they should then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor suffer him to speake with his men for feare he should commaund them to prouide somewhat more then for himselfe. Neuertheless, at his desire they suffered him onely in their presence aloude to tell one of his men, that hee would suppe that night in Apollo: (for so was one of his most stately and sumptuous haules of his house called) and with that word only he finely deceiued them both, and they neuer found him. For euery haule had his certaine summe and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery supper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and seruice for the same. So that when his seruantes had their watch worde but in what haule he would suppe, they knew straight what charge he would be at for his supper, & what orders should be obserued therin. Now Lucullus manner was to spende when he made any feast in the haule of Apollo, fifty thousand pence, and that selfe day the supper was prepared according to that value: insomuch as Pompey marueiled how it could be possible that a supper of so exceeding great charge could be so sodainly prepared. In such things therefore did Lucullus lauishly and riotously spende his goods, his spoyles in deede gotten of slaues and barbarous people. But that specially which he bestowed vppon bookes, was very commendable and honest expence. For he had gathered together great number of notable histories, the vse wherof was more honor to him, then the hauing of them. For his librarie was euer open to all cõmers, and they suffred the Grecians to come into his goodly tarrasses and faire walkes, or other pleasant places thereabouts conuenient, sit and reason together, and neuer shut dore against them; where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes spent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses being very glad when other matters were dispatched, they had so much leasure as but to go thither. And Lucullus selfe would also many times be amongst them, in those tarrasses and pleasant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to dispatch those that had any businesse with him, and granted the thing they requested of him. To conclude his house was a common receite for all them that came from Grece to Rome. He loued maner of Philosophy, and refused no sect of the same. But from his youth vpward, he euer ued & esteemed best the Academicke sect, not that which they cal the new Academie (although it florished at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made such alteration of) but the old Academicke, which the Philosopher Antiochus of the citie of Ascalon did defende and maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rethoritian and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to win by all meanes to make him his friend, and to haue him in house with him: because he might inuey against Philoes hearers & followers, whose scholler Cicero among the rest was, that wrote a notable booke against this old Academicke sect. And the same he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Academickes: who held that a man may certainly know and comprehend something, and called that Catalepsin: but Cicero defended the contrarie. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearsed before) very good friends, and had both one selfe desire for gouernement in the common wealth. For Lucullus did not so withdrawe himselfe from matters of state, that he would no more medle at all, nor heare speake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition & contention, as a thing of no small danger, and breeding great reproach and dishonour to Marcus Crassus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authoritie. And these two were they that defended the Senate whom they raised vp to withstand Pompeys greatnesse, being afrayed of him, after that Lu- er had refused the chiefe place of authoritie. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in the mar-place at courts and common councels, to pleasure his friends when they requested him: would go to the Senate also, when there was occasion to breake any new practise, or to verthrow Pompeys ambitious policie. For he ouerthrew all the orders and constitutions Lucullus and Cato against Pompey.

Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kings, Mithridates and Tigranes: and with helpe of Cato hindered a distribution of money which Pompey had written for to ROME, he bestowed amongst his souldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in friendship, (or to speake Pompey, Crassus, Cæsar, conspired together against the state. more plainly, in conspiracie) with Crassus and Cæsar, by whose helpe and assistaunce, he filled OME with armes and souldiers: and made the people by force to passe and confirme what he uld haue done, after he had violently expulsed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place.
Whereat the noble men were much offended, and misliking the great wrong they had offred ullus & Cato, Pompeys followers suborned a *BRVTIAN, & sayd he was taken lying in wait kill Pompey. Whereupon the said BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine: when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, saying that he had hyered him to kill mpey. But no man beleeued him. For they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was oured by themselues falsly to accuse Lucullus, and Pompeys other aduersaries. And this was ued more plainly within few dayes after, whē they threw the body of this BRVTIAN dead the middest of the street, out of the prison: who they say dyed of himselfe with sickenesse. wbeit the markes being plainly seene of the halter wherewith they had strangled him, and stripes appearing also which they had giuen him: did plainly shew that they themselues whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they slue in this manner. This was the why Lucullus did more then before absent himselfe from medling in publicke causes: but when he saw that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes also to conuey farre enough off, vnder pretenced colour to send him with charge into the Ile of C-
: then he gaue vp altogether. Some write that a litle before his death, he was not perfit wits, decaying through age by litle and litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos sayth, that it was Lucullus fell out of his wits before his death. for age, nor sickenesse, that his wits did alter: but through poyson which one of his slaues giuen him, whom he had made free, called Callisthenes: who gaue it him, not of any euill t, but because his maister should loue him the more, supposing that this poyson had pow-make him loue him. But he troubled his wits so much with this poyson, that Lucullus Callisthenes poysoned Lucullus wherof he dyed. he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouersee his goods. Notwithstanding Lucullus death. when he was dead, he was as much bewayled and lamented of all the people, as if he had in his best credit, and greatest prosperitie. For all the people ranne to honour his fune-and his body was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people ld in any case haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla: because no man thought of it before, and also for that things necessary were not easily to be ded for the place: his brother Marcus besought the people they would be content his fu-als might be at a towne of his owne, neare vnto the citie of THVSCVLVM, where his tombe was prepared, and he himselfe liued not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honour, had not left him farre behind him: so did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwayes dearely loued him, he could not then long liue; and suruiue him.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

Lucullus death blessed.

NOthing (in my opiniõ) made Lucullus more happy, then to dye w he did, before he saw the change and alteration of the cõmon we which the fatall destinies plagued the ROMAINES withall with dition & ciuill wars: & that he dyed in his country yet enioying liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that he was vnto Cimõ aboue all other things: who died whileſt the GRECI were in good loue & peace with other, & not in broyle of diſſ and ciuill warres. Indeede Cimon dyed in his camp, being general his country, at the siege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not w drawen to his home, as one wearied, liuing idlely, or leading a voluptuous life in feaſt banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: but as said (when he wisely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiſeth perpetuall drunken in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And th is a great comfort & contentation of minde, for an old man feebled with age, & compelled weakeneſſe, to withdraw himſelfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernemẽt in pe as in warres: and quietly to paſſe his time in ſtudy, where delight is ioyned with honeſt templation. But to finiſh his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleaſure, as vnto their ly end, and moreouer, to grow old by pleaſure and vanity, ſolemnizing Venus feaſt al the his life, after he hath made ſuch warres, & commaunded ſuch armies: that me thinkes a vnworthy of an honeſt ACADEMICKE, and altogether vnmeete for one profeſsing old crates doctrine, but fit rather for a man giuen ouer altogether to Epicurus diſcipline. The a wonderfull thing to be conſidered of in theſe two men, that the ones youth was altog vitious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrary, honeſt and vertuous. But he is the ter that chaungeth for the better: & that nature is alwayes more commendable, in whom decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time ſheweth ſtill contrary. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one ſelfe meane: but they did not be like vſe their riches. For it were to no purpoſe to compare the buildings of the wall that deth South within the caſtell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon bro thither: with the fine built chambers, & high raiſed turrets to gaſe a farre, & enuironned with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the ſpoyles of the barb people. Neither is Cimons table alſo of moderate fare & dyet, but yet open to euery man, parable to Lucullus bord: which was ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and ſhewed the greatneſſe Lord. For Cimons bord fed many mouthes daily with a ſmall charge: and Lucullus table ded in expence, to feede a few, with ſuperfluous dainties. Vnleſſe they will ſay, that time

A good gift to decay vice and to encreaſe vertue.

this difference betweene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leasure to haue withdrawn himselfe to quiet in age from gouernement, and armes, he also would not haue led a sumptuous and dissolute life, giuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature loued wine, banquets, and playes, and was also giuen to women, as we haue told you before. But prosperitie, and fortunate successe of things do bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises: that they make them forget to runne after their voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus dyed abroad in the warres, whilest he commanded armies: there had not bene that liuing man, how curious soeuer he had been to reproue other mens faults, that could haue detected him of any reprochfull vice.
Thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres: both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land. And touching games of prise and exercises of body which are shewed in GREECE, they that in one day won the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a strange custome, not victours onely, but victours also, to honour them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon likewise hauing in one selfe day crowned GREECE with two notable markes of triumph, two battels he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by land, deserueth to haue some place of preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus receiued the authoritie to command of his country and common wealth: but Cimon gaue his country both authoritie & skill to command. Lucullus found his country a commanding people to all their friends & confederates: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his country marching vnder an others enfigne, & through his valiantnesse did so behaue himselfe, that he made his citie go before her confederates, and triumph ouer her enemies: compelling the LACEDÆMONIANS by force to giue them the rule by sea, & perswading the LACEDÆMONIANS perforce to giue place vnto them by land. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make himselfe to be beloued of his souldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, and Cimon esteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates themselues. For Lucullus was forsaken of his own men: and Cimon was followed by very strangers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his country, forsaken of those he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe, commanding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his country three notable things, and hard for them to haue compassed: to wit, made peace with their enemies, giuen them authoritie and rule of their confederates, and ioyned friendship with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vndertooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all Asia. But neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the sodaine being generall, and when his affaires prospered best.
The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which caused them much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be sayd also, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his country for the space of ten yeares, because that in ten yeares space (as Plato sayth) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truly, it seldome times happeneth, that the graue wits of noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people: because they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much, as Surgeons do their patients when they binde vp their sores with bandes to cure them. For though by that binding they restore & bring to their naturall places againe the broken bones and members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus wēt a great deale further with his army, thē euer Cimon did. For he was the first ROMAINE Captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, & the riuer of Tigris with an army. He tooke & burnt almost in sight both the kings, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE, & NISI-BIS. Towards the North, he went as far as the riuer of Phasis towardes the East, into MEDIA: and Southward, euen to the red sea, and vnto the realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the ROMAINE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowen all the power of these two mightie kings, he tooke from them all, but their persons onely: who fled and hid themselues like wild beastes, in infinite deserts and vnpassable forrestes. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRECIANS, & ouerthrew the greatest part of their armie in EGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after [illegible] stories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding himselfe altogether pulled downe his knees, and broken by the former battels: durst neuer once onely shew his army vnto Pompey, out of the strength of his camp, but fled into the realme of BOSPHORVS, where he died. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himselfe on his knees, vnarmed, and without weapon vnto Pompey: and taking his diadeame off from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering for the victories he had won, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason of he scaped good cheape, & thought himselfe happy, when Pompey gaue him onely the and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be the more worthy Captaine, and stoutest champion, that leadeth his enemy in weather him that followeth, and shall fight afterwardes with him. And furthermore, Cimon power of the king of PERSIA ouerharried, the pride and fiercenesse of the PERSIANS ground, by many great battels they had lost before vnto Themistocles, king Pausanias, Aristides, who had ouerthrowen them: and going now againe to fight a fresh with them an easie thing to ouercome the bodies of those, whose harts were already vanquished. Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene ouercome, but bare a courageous lofty minde with him, for the many great battels and conquestes he had wonne. And the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betweene those that Cimon ouercame those that were raunged in battell against Lucullus. So that all things weighed and considered it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthiest man: for that it seemeth that the goddes did fauour both the one and the other, telling the one what he should do, and the other what he should not do. And this it appeareth by testimonie of the goddes, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlasting glorie.

THE LIFE OF Nicias.

I Haue reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Crassus, and the euents that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that befell the other in SICYLE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to read my writings, not to thinke me in entermedling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond himselfe, both for varietie and liuelinesse of narration, as also in choice and excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the historiographer had. Who, hoping by the grauitie and lise of his wordes & reports, to darken the glory of Thucydides, and make Philistus (in comparison of himselfe) appeare ignorant, and without any grace of historicall narration: hath in his history of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battels by sea and by land, and the report of those speaches and orations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neare them whom he contendes to passe, as doth the footeman to the LYDIAN coche, as sayth Pindarus: and besides sheweth himselfe fond and of small iudgement, or as Diphilus sayth.

A lubber laden with Sicylian grease.

And in diuers places, he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he sayth, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whose name was deriued of this word Nice, signifying victorie) dissuaded their attempts against SICYLE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to say, the images of Mercurie) it was foreshewed that they should receiue great ouerthrowes by the generall of the SYRACVSANS, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did iniour the SYRACVSANS, by reason of the goddesse Proserpina, (protectour and defendour of the citie of SYRACVSA) to requite her for that she gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, because they tooke the ÆGESTÆANS part: (who came of the TROYANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promise and league with him, whose city himselfe had ouerthrowen in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon the king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus shewes as much wit and iudgement, in delighting vs such toyes in an history: as he doth in correcting the stile of Philistus, or in condemning and railing of Plato and Aristotle. But in my fansie, this ambition and contention to write or to speake more clarkely then others, sheweth alwayes a base enuious minde, like a scholler full of his schoole points. But when it striueth with things that are past all chalenge and correcting, then is it extreme follie and madnesse. Since therefore I may not passe ouer nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philistus haue already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the varietie of his successes and fortune did couer: I must lightly touch them, and report so much as is necessary, and conuenient least men condemne me, for slouth and negligence. And in the rest I haue endeuoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and knowen, which I haue collected well out of sundry mens workes and ancient recordes, as out of many old antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will serue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be sayd that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous citizens of ATHENS, very honest men, & which fauoured the communaltie with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the sonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the sonne of Milesius, and Theramenes the sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account, for he is flouted as a forrenner borne in the Ile of CEOS, and chalenged besides for inconstant and irresolute in matters of state and gouernement: and inclining sometimes to one faction, sometimes to an other, he was called Cothurnus, a kinde of buskin indifferently seruing for both legges, and in old time was vsed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in fauour of the nobility against Pericles, who always tooke part with the inferiour sort. Nicias that was the younger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioyned Captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himselfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobilitie raised him to great authoritie to be as a strong bulwarke for them, against Cleons insolency & boldnesse: and with all he had the loue of the people, to aduaunce and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did so flatter and dandle them, like an old man, still feeding their humour with gaine: but yet they themselues whom he thus flattered, knowing his extreme couetousnesse, impudency, and boldnesse, preferred Nicias before him, because his grauity was not severe nor odious, but mingled with a kinde of modesty, that he seemed to feare the people of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and esteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearefull & mistrustfull nature & disposition: in warres he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauoured him alike in all his iourneys and exploits that he tooke in hand where he was Captaine. Now being much afrayed of accusers, this timorous manner of proceeding in the citie, was found to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good will of the people: and by meanes thereof rose daily more and more, because the people commonly feare those that hate them, & aduaunce them that feare them. For the greatest honour nobilitie can do to the communaltie, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfit vertue onely, & force of his great eloquence ruled the whole state and common wealth of ATHENS, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to winne their fauour and good willes: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth enough, sought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauour. And where Cleon would entertaine the ATHENIANS with pleasant toyes and deuises, and could feede the peoples humour this way: Nicias finding himselfe no fit man to worke by such encounter, crept into the people's fauour with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with such like sumptuousnesse, exceeding in cost and pleasunt sportes, not onely all those that had bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his consecrating vnto the goddesse the image of Pallas in the castle of ATHENS, the gilt being worne off: and the chappell which is vnder the festiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe prise in Bacchus disses, and neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, there goeth a report that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth vpon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: & being a goodly tall young man without any haire on his face, the ATHENIANS tooke such pleasure to see him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. There withall Nicias stood vp, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, the openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young slaue a free man. Men write also of certaine sumptuous and deuout acts he did in the Ile of DELOS, where the dancers and singers which the cities of GREECE sent thither to sing rhimes and verses in the honour of Apollo, were wonte before to arriue disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ran to see them, who made them sing straight without any order, and landing in hast out of their shippes, they left their apparell, and put on such vestements as they should weare in procession, and their garlands of flowers on their heads, all at one present time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to present the singers of ATHENS, landed first in the Ile of RENIA, hard adioyning to the Ile of DELOS, with his singers, his beasts for sacrifice, and with all the rest of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATHENS, vppon measure taken of the channell betwixt the one and the other Ile set out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with nosegaies and garlands of triumphe, and with excellent wrought tapistry: which in the night he set vp vpon the channell being not very broade, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his singers to passe ouer vpon it, singing all the way as they went in his procession so nobly set forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the sacrifice, the feast, and games that were to be solemnized were finished, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, beside landes besides that coste him tenne thousand Drachmas, which he consecrated also vnto the god Patron of the Ile: and ordained, that the profites of the same should be yearely followed by the DELIANS, vppon an open sacrifice and feast, in the which they should pray for their god, for the health and prosperitie of Nicias: and so caused it to be written and graued vpon a piller he left in DELOS, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offering, and foundation. Afterwardes, this copper palme tree being broken by windes, it fell vpon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremonie and acte of his, there was a maruellous pompe, and great shew of popular ambition: nouertheless, he that shall consider of his life and actions, may easily perswade himselfe that aboue all, he did it of very pure zeale and deuotion, and secondly, to giue pleasure and pastime to the people. For by Thucydides reporte of him, he was one that feared the gods with ouermuch superstition. Nicias superstitious.

troubling, and was wholly giuen to religion. We finde written in one of the dialogues of Posphoon, that Nicias did sacrifice dayly to the goddes, and kept a soothsayer continually in his house, giuing out abroade, that it was to counsell with him what should happen about the affaires of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquire of his owne businesse, and specially of his mines of siluer. For he had many great mines about LAVRION that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great daunger, and he was driuen continually to keepe a maruellous number of slaues at worke there. The most part of Nicias riches was in ready money, and thereby he had many craners and hangers on him, whome he gaue money vnto: for he gaue as well vnto wicked people that might doe him hurte, as vnto them that deserued rewarde, and were worthie of his liberalitie. Thus was his geare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was also a reuenue to the good: and herevpon the comicall Poets do deliuer vs auncient testimonie. For Teleclides speaking of a certaine informer saith thus: Nicias mines of siluer. Nicias for feare gaue to the wicked.

Charicles did refuse to giue one Mina for to slay, The bruting of his secret birth, a couered close away:
But Nice, the sonne of Nicerate, did willingly bestow, A brace of Minas double told. And though I well do know The cause of his so doing, yet I will not him bewray:
For why? The man is my good friend, and wise I dare well say.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedy intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine simple man vpon the stage, doth aske him:

The informer.

How long is it ago since thou didst speake with Nicias?

The plaine man.

The informer.

This man affirmes he saw him there. And wherefore should he say He saw him, but of some intent his lewdnesse to bewray?
Now sirs yee see how Nicias here is taken in the trip,
For all his walking close in cloudes to giue the priuie slip.

The Authour.

O foolish folke, suppose ye that so good a man as he,
In any fault or shamefull fact will tardy taken be?

And Cleon threatning in the comedie of Aristophanes, intituled the Knightes, saith these wordes.

The Orators if by the throte I take,
Then sure I am, that Nicias straight will quake.

Phrynichus selfe also telleth vs glauncingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frai when he said speaking of an other man:

A good stout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward like to Nicias.

Nicias warinesse to offend.

Now Nicias being thus timerous of nature, and fearing to giue any litle occasion to t Orators to accuse him: kept himselfe so warily, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with man in the city, nor yet put foorth himselfe in companie to talke, or passe the time among them, but altogether auoided such sports and pleasures. For when he was in office, he wo neuer out of the counsell house, but still busied him selfe in dispatching causes, from mo ning till night, and was euer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he ha matter of state in hand, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no ceasse vnto him, but kept close in his house: and some of his friends did euer aunswere t that came to his gate, and praied them to pardon him, saying, that he was busie then ab affaires of the cõmonwealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, & himselfe taught him both learning and musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrume keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnesse gravity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they certaine Poeticall workes at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of me were sent to dwell in ITALIE, did build there the citie of THVRIES. Hieron I say did serue turne, and holpe him secretly to enquire what he would vnderstand of the Soothsaiers, gaue out these wordes among the people: that Nicias led too miserable and painefull a for the common great care he tooke to serue the commonwealth: insomuch, as though he w in his hotte house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his minde ranne still of some m about the commonwealth, and to serue the state, did neglect his owne priuate affaires that he scarce began to sleepe and take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sl and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was grown crabbed and vneoutr euen to such as before had bene his familiar friends. So that, said he, he loseth them tog with his goods, and all for seruice of the commonwealth: where others grow riche, and friends, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make merry among t and sporte with the matters of state which they haue in their hands. Now in troth, such Nicias life.

Nicias life, that he might truely say that which Agamemnon spake of himselfe in the trag of Euripides, called Iphigenie in AVLIDE:

In outward shew of stately pompe, all others I exceede, And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very deede.

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in some things did serue their turnes with the e rience of them, that were eloquent, and wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted sufficiencie, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking the thority from them: as for proofe the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon the mistrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNVSIAN, and moreouer by that they did vnto P (that tooke the Ile of LESBOS) who being brought before the iudges in open councel to g vp an account of his charge, drew out his sworde, and slue himselfe in presence of them

Nicias I say, remembring these examples, sought euer to flie from these offices, which were either too great, or too small, and when he accepted any, had speciall regarde to worke surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniecture, prospered maruellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisedom, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himselfe to lessen his glory, and that onely to auoide enuie: As the euent of things falling out euen in his time do sufficiently witnesse vnto vs. For the citie of ATHENS hauing susteined many great losses and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the ATHENIANS were ouercome in THRACIA by the CHALCIDONIANS, howbeit it was vnder the leading of Calliades & Xenophon, who were their Captaines. An other time, the losse they had in ÆTOLIA vnder the charge of Demosthenes. Moreouer at DELIVM, a city of BOEOTIA, where they lost a thousand men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being there Generall. And as touching the plague, the greatest number laide the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of warres, kept the men that came out of the countrie, within the walles of the citie of ATHENS: and so by changing of aire, and their wonted maner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burthened: but contrariwise he being Captaine tooke the Ile of CYTHERA, which the LACEDÆMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for situation to molest and destroy the country of LACONIA. He wan diuers cities againe that had rebelled in THRACIA, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of ATHENS. At his first comming hauing shut in the MEGARIANS within their walles, he tooke the Ile of MINOA: and at his departure thence, shortly after wanne the hauen of Nisea also. Furthermore, landing in the countrie of the CORINTHIANS, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and slue a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chaunsed to forget to bury two of his men that were slaine, whose bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the rest: howbeit, so soone as he heard of it, he caused all his fleete to stay, and sent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away those two bodies. Now, though by lawe of armes they that sent to aske leaue to take away their dead to burie them, did thereby lose the honor of their victory, & were barred to set vp any marke or token of triumph, because it seemed by the sute, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petitioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed not to haue made demaund of them: Nicias notwithstanding was contented rather to forsake the honor of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his countrymen in the field without buriall. So, after he had deuoided all the coast of LACONIA, and had ouercome certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that came against him in battel: he tooke the city of THYREA, which the ÆGINETES kept at that time, whom he brought prisoners vnto ATHENS. And when the PELOPONNESIANS had prepared great armies both by sea and by land to besiege the fort of PYLE, the which Demosthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being giuen by sea, it chansed there remained foure hundred natural citizens of SPARTA, within the Ile of SPACTERIA. Now the ATHENIANS thought it a noble exploite of them, (as in deed it was) to take those foure hundred aliue: howbeit the siege was very sore, because they lacked water euen in the middest of summer, and were forced to fetch a maruellous compasse to bring victuals to their campe, which when winter should once come, would be very dangerous, and almost an impossible thing to do. Whereupon, they then became sory, and repented them much that they had sent away the Ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS which came to them to treate of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) suffred them to depart in that sorte without resolution taken: who was against them altogether, onely to do Nicias a despight, being his enemy, and did earnestly solicite the matter the LACEDÆMONIANS requested. This was the cause why Cleon perswaded the ATHENIANS, to refuse their offer of peace. But when the people sawe that this siege drew out in length, and that their campe suffered grieuous wantes and necessities: then fell they out with Cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, saying that through his feare he would let the besieged SPARTANS escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not haue holden out so long. Thereupon the ATHENIANS saide aloude to Cleon: and why doest not thou go thither yet to take them? Moreouer Nicias selfe also rising vp, openly gaue him his authoritie to take this Pyle, and bad him leauy as many souldiers as he would to goe thither, and not to brag with such impudent wordes where was no danger, but to do some notable seruice to the commonwealth. Cleon at the first shrunke back, being amazed withall, little thinking they would haue taken him so sodainly at his worde. But in the end, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias also was importunate with him: ambition so enflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge vpon him, but in a brauerie said, that within twenie daies after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the sword, or bring them prisoners vnto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Cleon say so, had more lust to laugh a good, then to beleeue that he spake: for it was their maner euer to laugh at his anger & folly. For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being solemnly assembled in councell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would say, and hauing taried long for him: at the length he came with a garland on his head, and praied the assemblie to dismisse the court till the next morning: for, quoth he, I shall not be at leisure to day, because I haue sacrificed, and doe feast also certaine strangers my friends that are come to see me. So the people burst out in a laughing, and brake vp the assembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauored him at that time, and he handled himselfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, sauing such as were slaine: and hauing made them yeelde, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproache. For it appeared not only a casting away of his shield, but worse then that, a voluntary forsaking of his prouince vpon a base timerous minde, giuing his enemy occasion thereby to do some noble exploite, depriuing himselfe of his honorable charge. Wherfore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedie of birdes, saying:

Ieast of Cleon.

Cleons victorie of the Lacedemonians.

It is no time to sleepe and linger still,
As Nicias doth: without good cause or skill.

Also in an other place of his comedy of plowmen he saith:

I faine would follow husbandrie. VVho lets thee? Mary you.
A thousand Drachmaes I will giue to be discharged now Of office in the commonweale. Content, so shall we haue Two thousand Drachmaes iust, with those that Nicias lately gaue.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the commonwealth, suffring Cleon in that sort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that victory, Cleon grew to so haughtie a minde, and pride of himselfe, that he was not to be dealt withall: whereupon fell out the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the city of ATHENS, which most grieued Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things tooke away the modesty and reuerence vsed before in publicke Orations to the people: he of all other was the first that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, and flung vp and downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiousnesse, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Orators and counsellers fell into, that dealt in matters of state and commonwealth, and was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to growe in credit, by practise in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill: but as they say of the land of EGYPT, that for the fatnesse and lustinesse of the soile,

It bringeth forth both holsome herbes, and also noisome weeds.

Euen so Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was ridde of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnesse. For when the commonwealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warre, through Alcibiades extreame furie of ambition. And thus it began. The onely peacebreakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GREECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas: for warre cloked the wickednesse of the one, and aduanced the valiantnes of the other, giuing to either occasion to do great mischiefe, and also oportunitie to worke many noble exploites. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by Amphipolis, Nicias straight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so hotly giuen to the warres, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet: deuised what meanes he might vse to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GREECE also from broile and miserie of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enioy a peaceable and happy life. The riche men, the olde men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to peace: and talking priuately also with diuerse others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of warres. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they sought it: the SPARTANS beleeued him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very soft and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their prisoners of SPARTA, (who had bene taken at the forte of Pyle) were gentlely intreated, and had made their miserable captiuitie more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betweene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one an other againe, and beginning to taste the sweetnesse and pleasures of peace, and the safety of free accesse one to see an others friends that were strangers: began then to wishe that they might still continue in peace and amitie together, without effusion of bloud of either partie, and tooke great delight in their daunces, to heare them sing such songs:

Nicias reconcileth the Spartans with the Athenians.

And let my speare lye ouergrowne, with dusty spiders webs.

They did also with great ioy & gladnesse remember him which said, that in peace no sound of trumpet, but the crowing of the cock doth wake them that be a sleepe: and on the other side they cursed and tooke on with them that said it was predestined, the warre should continue thrise nine yeares. And so, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuersall peace throughout all GREECE. Now most men thought that surely all their sorrowes and miseries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, saying: that he was a man beloued of the goddes, who for his deuotion towards them, had this speciall gift giuen him, that the greatest blessing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confesse a troth, euery man was certainly perswaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light causes perswaded the GRECIANS to runne headlong into most grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other side had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurtes the one had receiued of the other in former wars. And euen to this present day, that peace is called Nicium, as who would say, Nicias peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either side they should alike deliuer vp the cities, and landes, which each had taken from other in time of warres, together with the prisoners also: and that they should first make restitution, whose lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophrastus report) for ready money secretlie bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the first that should make restitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that disliked of this peace, sought by the complaintes they made, to renue the warre againe: Nicias then perswaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they should adde for strength vnto their country, the alliance and peace offensiue and defensiue made betweene them, for a more sure knot of friendship, whereby they might be the better assured the one of the other, and also the more dreadfull to their enemies that should rebell against them. These things went cleane against Alcibiades minde: who besides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they sought to Nicias & made none account of him, but despised him. Here was the occasion that caused Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could do to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet shortly after, Alcibiades perceiuing that the ATHENIANS liked not so well of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as they did before, & that they thought themselues iniured by them, because they had lately made league with the BOEOTIANS without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of PANACTVM and AMPHIPOLIS according to the conditions articled betweene them: began then to enlarge & aggranate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with euery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambassadors from the city of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and so handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made league offensiue and defensiue with them.

Nicias peace.

Ambassadors sent frō Sparta to Athens.

While these matters were thus in hand, there came to ATHENS also Ambassadors from LACEDÆMON, with full power and authoritie to set all things at stay, and to compound all controuersies: who hauing first spoken with the Senate, propounded things vnto them both verie honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affraide that they letting the people vnderstand so much, should thereby bring them to yeelde to what they desired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambassadors by this deuise. He promised vpon his othe to helpe them in that they went about, so farre foorth as they would not confesse themselues to haue absolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleeue it was the only way to bring their matters to passe. The Ambassadors giuing credit to his words, relied vpon him, and so forsooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people being set in councell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accorde all matters yea or no. Whereunto they made him aunswere with a loude voice, that they had not.

Thereupon Alcibiades, contrarie both to their expectation, and his owne othe and promise made vnto them: began to call the councell to witnesse, whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary: and so aduised the people not to trust nor giue credit vnto such men, as were openly taken with so manifest a lie, & that in one selfe matter would one while say one thing, another while an other. It bootes not to aske whether the Ambassadors were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himselfe wist not what to say to the matter, the suddennesse of the cause did so confuse and grieue him, being a thing he least looked for. Nowe the people they were so moued besides, that they became indifferent whether to haue sent for the Ambassadors of ARGOS presently to haue made league with them or not: but there fell out an earthquake vpon this matter, that greatly serued Nicias turne, and brake vp the assemblie. The people meeting againe in councell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doe, or say, could scant withhold them from making league with the ARGIVES: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the LACEDÆMONIANS, promising he would make all wel again.

Thereupon, Nicias going to SPARTA, was receiued and honoured there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought wel affected towards them: but for the rest, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercome by those that fauored the BOEOTIANS, returned againe to ATHENS: he departed thence. Where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, he was also in danger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request and counsell had redeliuered such men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For indeed, the prisoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the forte of Pyle, were all of the chiefest houses of SPARTA, and their kinsmen and friends were the noblest men of the city. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, sauing that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the ELIANS, and MANTINIANS (which had reuolted from the LACEDÆMONIANS) and with the ARGIVES also: and sent pirats to the forte of Pyle, to spoile the country of LACONIA. Vpon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell again into warres. Now when the quarrell and controuersie was greatest betwene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracismon (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for ten yeares any such of their citizens as they thought either of too great authoritie, or that was most enuied for his wealth and substance. Alcibiades and Nicias were then not a little perplexed, considering their present danger, being sure that the one of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, & were afraide of his valiantnesse: as we haue more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied, besides they misliked his strange maner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuersant with the people than he was, and counted him too stately: moreouer they hated him also, because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the people desired, and had enforced them against their willes to agree to that which was profitable for themselues. In fine to speake more plainly, there fell out great strife betwene the young men that would haue warres, and the olde men that coueted peace: some desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades: but

Where discorde reignes in realme or towne, The wicked win the chiefest renowne.

And so fell it out then. For the ATHENIANS being deuided in two factions, gaue authority to certaine of the most impudent and insolent persons that were in all the city: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the towne of PERITHVS, a man of no hauior nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit and power, dishonoring his countrey, by the honor they gaue him. Now Hyperbolus thinking him selfe free at that time from any daunger of banishment, (hauing rather deserued the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well enough that remained behinde: shewed openly that hee was glad of their discord and variance, and busily stirred vp the people against them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practises, hauing secretly talked together, ioyned both their factions in one: whereby they brought it so to passe, that neither of them were banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for tenne yeares. Which matter for the present time made the people very mery, though afterwardes it grieued them much, seeing their ordinaunce of the Ostracismon blemished by the vnworthines of the person: which punishment was an honor vnto him. For this banishment was thought a meete punishment for Thucydides, Aristides, and such like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honor, and too manifest an occasion of glory to be giuen to him, that for his wickednes had the selfe same punishment, which was to be inflicted vpō the chiefest estates for their greanes. And the comicall Poet Plato him selfe saieth in a place.

Hyperbolus.

Nicias and Alcibiades ioyned tribes against Hyperbolus.

Hyperbolus banished for tenne yeares.

Although his lewd behauiour did deserue as much or more, Yet was not that the punishment he should haue had therefore,
The Ostracie deuised was for men of noble fame, And not for varlets, whose lewd life deserued open shame.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man banished with the Ostracismon. For him selfe was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, & neerest kinsman to the tyrant was the first. Sure fortune is a very vncertaine thing, and without conceit of reason. For had Nicias franckly put himselfe to the hazard of this banishmēt against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victory, his aduersary being banished: or being conuict by his banishment to haue scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwardes fell into, besides the fame he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercome. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus writeth, how Hyperbolus not Nicias, was banished through the dissention that fell betwixt Phaeax and Alcibiades: albeit most writers agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being come to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA: Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft & ambition. For he, before they were called to councell, had already through false surmises filled the peoples heads with a vaine hope and perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, and the old men also in artificers shoppes, and in their common schooles, or halfe circles where they sate talking together, were euery one occupied about drawing the platforme of SICILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN sea, and reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that SICILE should be the end of their warres, but rather the store-house and armory for all their munition and martiall prouision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, euen to Hercules pillers. Now all their mindes being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, hee found very few men of quality to stand by him. For the rich, fearing least the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge, and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though indeede not contented with all: yet would not Nicias leaue still to counsel thē to the contrary. But when they had past the decree in councel for the enterprise of SICILE, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the first session of the councell holden in the city, Nicias rose vp againe, to see if hee could turne the people from this iourney with all the protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and priuate commodity, he brought the common wealth into so farre and daungerous a warre. But all his wordes preuailed not. Him selfe before all others was thought the meeteſt man for this charge, partly becauſe of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater ſafetie, when his timorous foreſight ſhould be ioined with Alcibiades valiantnes, and with Lamachus ſoftnes, which in deede moſt confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demoſtratus one of the Orators that moſt procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterpriſe ſtepped foorth, and ſayd. It were good that Nicias left off, and ſet aſide all theſe excuſes and deuiſes, and preferred a decree, that the people ſhould throughly authoriſe the Captaines that were choſen, to ſet forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and ſo perſwaded the people to paſſe and authoriſe it. Yet it is ſayd that the Prieſtes obiected many things to hinder the iourney. But Alcibiades alſo hauing ſuborned certaine Soothſayers, alleaged in like caſe ſome auncient Oracles that ſayd, the ATHENIANS ſhould haue great honour from SICILE: and further had entiſed certaine pilgrimes, who ſayed they were lately newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence, That the Athenians ſhould take all the Syracuſans. But worſt of all, if any knew of contrary ſignes or tokens to come, they held their peace, leaſt it ſhould ſeeme they entermedled to prognoſticate euill for affections ſake, ſeeing that the ſignes them ſelues, which were moſt plaine and notorious, could not remoue them from the enterpriſe of this iourney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes, and images of Mercury, which in one night were all to be mangled, ſauing one image onely called the Hermes of Andocides, which was giuen and conſecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was ſet vppe directly ouer againſt a citizens houſe called Andocides. Furthermore, the chaunce that happened by the aulter of the twelue gods: where a man leaping ſodainely vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his priuities with a ſtone. And in a temple alſo in the city of DELPHES, where was a litle image of Minerua of gold, ſet vpon a palme tree of copper, which the city of ATHENS had giuen of the ſpoiles won of the MEDES. Vppon that palme tree ſate certaine crowes many daies together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the fruite of it which was all of gold, vntill they made the ſame to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS ſayd, that the DELPHIANS (when the SYRACVSANS had ſubdued) had finely fained this deuiſe. There was a prophecy alſo that commanded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nuns to ATHENS, that was in the city of CLAZOMENES. So they ſent for this Nun called Heſychia, which is, reſt: and it ſeemeth it was for which the goddes by this prophecy did counſell them vnto, that for that time they ſhould be quiet. Meton the Aſtronomer hauing charge in the army leuied for the warre of SICILE, being afraied of this prophecy, or otherwiſe miſliking the celeſtiall ſignes, and ſucceſſe of the iourney: fained him ſelfe mad, and ſet his houſe a fire. Others ſay he counterfeited not madneſs but did one night in deede ſet his houſe a fire, and that the next morning looking ruefully vpon it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitifull ſtate, to ſue to the people, that in conſideration of his great misfortune happened him, they would diſcharge his ſonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gally at his owne coſt, and ready to make ſaile. Moreuer, the familiar ſpirite of wiſe Socrates that did vſe to tell him before what ſhould happen, told him then that this iorney would fall out to the deſtruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumor became common. And it alſo troubled a number of them, for the vnlucky daies on the which they did imbarke: for they were the very daies on the which the women celebrated the feaſt and yeareday of Adonis death: and there were alſo in diuerſe partes of the city, images of dead men caried to burial, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that ſuch as did put any confidence in thoſe ſignes, ſayed they miſliked it much, and that they were afraied leaſt the ſame ſignified that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was ſet out with ſuch pompe and bruery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he ſpake againſt this warre in open counſell, whileſt they were deliberating vpon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of ſo honorable a charge to make him chaunge his mind therein ſurely he ſhewed him ſelfe an honeſt man, wiſe, and conſtant. But when he ſaw plainly that he could by no perſwaſions remoue the people from the enterpriſe of this warre, neither yet by ſute nor intreaty get him ſelfe diſcharged from being a Captaine thereof, but they would in any case make him one of the heades of the army: then was it out of time to be fearefull, and still giuing backe, turning his head so ofte like a childe to looke vpon his gally behinde him, and euer to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of his iorney. For in deede this was enough to discorage his companions, and to mar all at their first setting out: where, to say truly, he should sodainly haue set vpon his enemies, and haue gone to it with a lusty corage, to haue assayed fortune. But he took a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first comming to go straight to SYRACVSA, and to giue them battell as neare the wals as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other side was of opinion first of all to goe about to winne the cities that were in league with the SYRACVSANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to goe against the SYRACVSANS themselues. Nicias to the contrary spake in councell, and thought it better to goe on faire and softly, deferring the coasts of SICILE round about, to view their gallies and preparation, and so to returne straight to ATHENS againe, leauing only a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning maruellously cooled the corage of the souldiers, and quite discoraged them. Shortly after also, the ATHENIANS hauing sent for Alcibiades to aunswere to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in sight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenaunt generall of all the army) still vsed delayes, running vp and downe, and spending time so long in consultation, till the souldiers were eleft without both hope and corage: & the feare the enemy had of them at their first comming to see so great an army, was now in maner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was sent for from ATHENS, they went with three score gallies to SYRACVSA, of the which they placed fifty in battell ray out of the hauen, and sent the other ten into the hauen to discouer: which approaching neare the city, caused an Herauld to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their lands and possessions, and tooke a shippe of the enemies, in the which among other things they found tables, wherein were written the names of al the inhabitants of SYRACVSA, according to their tribes and houses. These tables were kept farre from the city, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had sent for them to know the number of men of seruice, and of age to beare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the generals of the army, the Soothsayers seeing this long rolle of names, at the first misliked it, fearing least the prophecy had bene fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACVSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophecy came to passe in an other exploit, when Calippus ATHENIAN hauing slaine Dion,, wanne also the city of SYRACVSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the sway and commaunded the whole army. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stout man, an honest man, and very valiant of his handes, and one that would not spare him selfe in time of neede: neuertheless he was so poore and miserable, that euen when he was in state of a Generall and gaue vp an accompt of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much for a gowne, and so much for a paire of pantophles. Where Nicias authority and reputation contrariwise was of an other maner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in councell with his companions in the counsell house at ATHENS, about the dispatch of certaine causes, he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present amongest them, and bad him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles aunswered him againe: in deede I confesse I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom euery man regardeth best. So hauing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine and man of war then him selfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge by deferring off time still, and houeling about SICILE as farre from his enemies as he could: he first gaue the enemies time and leasure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to besiege HYBLA, being but a pelting litle towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into so great a contempt with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckonning of him. At last, he retired vnto CATANA with his army, without any other exploite done, sauing that hee tooke Hyccara, a baggage village of the barbarous people, and where it is sayed Lais the courtisan was borne, and that being then a young girle, shee was sold among other prisoners and afterwards caried into Peloponnesus. And in fine, the summer being farre spent, Nicias was informed that the Syracusans had taken such corage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge vppon them first: and that their horsemen were approached already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the Athenians in mockery, if they were come into Sicile to dwell with the Catanians, or to restore the Leontines their landes againe. Hereupon with much a do, Nicias determined to go to Syracusa.

because he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hazard: he sent one of Catana before to Syracusa, to tell them (as if he had bene a spie) that if they would sodainely come and set vpon the campe of the Athenians & take all their cariage, he wished them to come with all their power to Catana at a day certain which he would appoint them. For the Athenians (said he) for the most part are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens which fauoring the Syracusans, haue determined so soone as they heare of their comming to keepe the gates of the city, and at the same time also to set the Athenians shippes on fire, and how there were also a great number in the city of this confederacy, that did but looke euery hower for their comming. And this was the noblest stratageme of warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in Sicile. For by this deuise hee made the Syracusans come into the field with all their power, so that they left their city without guard: and he himself departing in the meane time from Catana with all his fleete, wanne the hauen of Syracusa at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him in the which he was both the stronger, & might without let or difficulty set vpon them where that, wherein he most trusted. The Syracusans returning straight from Catana and offering him battell hard by the wals of Syracusa, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the Syracusans slaine at this battell, because their horsemen did hinder the chase: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges vpon the riuer, gaue Hermocrates occasion to mock him. For, comforting and encoraging the Syracusans, he told them Nicias deserued to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if hee had not purposely come from Athens to Syracusa to fight. This notwithstanding, he made the Syracusans quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose but three only, to whom the people were sworne, that they would suffer them to haue full power and authority to command and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympius stood hard by the Athenians campe, which they would gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iewels and offerings of gold and siluer, giuen vnto the temple afore time. But Nicias of purpose still draue off time, and delayed so long, till the Syracusans at last sent a good garrison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with him selfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoile the temple, his countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and him selfe besides should beare all the blame of sacrilege. So, hauing obtained victory without profite, (which neuertheless straight through Sicile) within few dayes after he returned vnto the city of Naxos, where he lay all the winter, consuming a wonderfull masse of victuals with so great an army, for nothing doing of things of small moment, vppon certaine Sicilians that yeelded to him. The Syracusans in the meane time being in hart againe, & coragious: returned to Catana, where they spoiled and ouerranne all the countrey, and burnt the campe of the Athenians. Hereupon euery man blamed Nicias much, because through his long delay, and protracting of time to make all things sure, he let slippe sundry occasions of notable exploites, wherein good service might haue bene done. Yet when he would doe a thing in deede, he did it so thoroughly that no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to so good a passe: and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all speede, though he was both slow to determine and a coward to enterprise. Now when he remoued his army to return to Syracusa, he brought it so orderly, and also with such speede and safety: that he was come by sea to Thapsus, and landed and taken the fort of Epipolis, before the Syracusans had any intelligence of it, or could possibly helpe it. For the choise men of the Syracusans being set out against him, hoping to haue stopped his passage: he ouerthrew them, tooke three hundred prisoners and made their horsemen flie, which before were thought inuincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS most afraied, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this: that in a very short space he had almost enuironned SYRACVSA with a wall, which was as much in compasse about, as the wals of ATHENS, and worse to performe, by reason of the woddy countrey, and for the sea also that beateth vppon the wals, besides that there were diuerse marishes hard by it: and yet (sicke as he was of the stone) hee had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, vnto his sickenesse. For mine owne part I wonder maruellously both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiauntnesse and dexterity of the souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Euripides after their ouerthrow and vtter ruine, made a funerall Epitaphe in verse, and sayeth thus.

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracusa to flight, So long as with indifferency the goddes did vse their might.

But we finde it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not only eight times, but many times more ouerthrowen by them: a time at length there was in deede, that both the gods and fortune fought against them, euen when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power? Now Nicias in his owne person was euer in the greatest and most weighty affaires, striuing with his sicke body. Howbeit one day when his disease grew sore vpon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a wall from the city, vnto the wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purposed to haue shutte them in, to keepe that they should not compasse it rounde. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these skirmishes, they many times ouer rashly followed the chase of their enemies that fled. As it chaunced one day that Lamachus went so farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horsemen of the city, before whom Callicrates marched formost, a valiant man of his handes, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was first hurt: but he gaue Callicrates also such a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the stronger side, tooke vp his body, and caried it away with them: but they spurred out for to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without any gard or succour at all: nevertheless, Nicias rose with speede out of his bed, and perceiuing the daunger he was in, commaunded certaine of his friendes to set the wodde a fire which they had brought within the trenches of the campe, to make certaine deuises for battery, and the engines of timber also that were already made. That deuise onely stayed the SYRACVSANS, saued Nicias, and the strength of their campe, together with all the siluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS perceiuing a farre off, betwixt them and the strength of their campe, such a great flame as rose vp in the aire: vpon sight of it turned taile straight, and made towardes their city. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left sole Captaine of the army without anie companion, in great hope notwithstanding to do some good: diuers cities of SICILY yeelded vnto him, shippes fraught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many submitted themselues, for the good successe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS also sent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their city any longer against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, coming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderstanding by the way how the city of SYRACVSA was shut in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: held on his voyage notwithstanding, not with any hope to defend SICILIE (supposing the ATHENIANS had won the whole country) but with intent neuertheless to helpe the cities of ITALY if he could possibly. For it was common rumor abroade, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wisdome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias him selfe now contrary to his wonted wisdome and foresight, trusting altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, and specially beleuing the reports that were told him of SYRACVSA, and the newes that were brought him thence by some of them selues, which came secretly vnto him, perswading him that within few dayes he should haue SYRACVSA by composition: took no care to with-they would then quickely seeke to him for peace, as they had done afore time. For there many within SYRACVSA that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for were weary of warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but stri a litle more with want of victuals, they would yeeld straight. Nicias deliuering these p sions somwhat darkly, & keeping somewhat also from vtterance, because he would not them openly: made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlinesse, and that he re againe to his former delayes to keepe all in security, by which manner of proceeding from the beginning killed the hearts of his armie, for that he had not at his first com vpon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the courage of his souldiers wa and done, and himselfe also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Eurhydemus and der, stucke to Demosthenes opinion: wherunto Nicias was also forced against his will to

So Demosthenes the selfe same night taking the footemen, went to assault the fort of E where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he slew many of them, a the rest flie that offered resistance. But not content with this victory, he went farther fell vpon the BOEOTIANS. They gathering themselues together were the first that resi ATHENIANS, basing their pikes with such fury and loude cries, that they caused the to retire, and made all the rest of the assailantes affraide and amased. For the formost backe, came full vpon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and the for a charge, resisted them with all their force, & so mistaking one another, both were ded and slaine, and the hurt they ment vnto their enemies, did vnfortunately light vppo owne fellowes. For this multitude meeting thus confusedly together, what throug great feare, & what for that they could not discerne one an other in the night, the whi neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleare, as they might certainly by sight what they were that met them: (for then the moone declined a pace, and th light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to and fro) the feare they had euemie, made them mistrust their friendes. All these troubles and disaduantages had THENIANS, and beside, the moone on their backes, which causing the shadow to fall fro did hide their number, and glistering of armour: and contrarily, the enemies targets in their eyes by the reflection of the moone that shone vppon them, encreased their fe making them seeme a greater number and better appointed then they were in deede.

the enemies giuing a lusty charge vppon them on euery side, after they once beganne backe and turne taile: some were slaine by their enemies, others by their owne compa others also brake their neckes falling from the rockes. The rest that were dispersed a in the fieldes, were the next morning euery man of them put to the sworde by the bot So the account made, two thousand ATHENIANS were slaine, and very few of them by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mis it would thus come to passe, was maruellously offended with Demosthenes, and condem rashnes. But he excusing himselfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in th ning betimes, and so to hoise saile homewardes. For, saide he, we must looke for no re from ATHENS, neither are we strong enough with this army to ouercome our enemi though we were, yet must we of necessity auoide the place we are in, because (as it is re it is alwaies vnholsome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, son of the autumne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly see by experience. F ny of their people were already sicke, and all of them in maner had no minde to tary. N no case liked the motion of departing thence, because he feared not the SYRACVSA rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations & condemnation. And therefore in open cell he tolde them, that as yet he saw no such danger to remaine: and though there were that he had rather die of his enemies hands, than to be put to death by his owne countr

Being therein of a contrary mind to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that said to his citizens rather suffer death by you, than to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for remouing campe to some other place, they should haue leasure enough to determine of that m they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in councell, Dem ning had ill lucke at his first comming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing Nicias stucke not so hard against their departure, but that he relied vpon the trust & confidence he had of some within the citie: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new supply come vnto the SYRACVSANS, and that they saw the plague encreased more and more in their campe: then Nicias selfe thought it best to depart thence, and gaue notice to the souldiers to prepare themselues to shippe away. Notwithstanding, when they had put all things in readinesse for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemy, or motion thereof: the moone beganne to eclipse in the night, and sodainly to lose her light, to the great feare of Nicias and diuerse others, who through ignorance and superstition quailed at such sightes. For, touching the eclipse and darkening of the sunne, which is euer at any coniunction of the moone, euery common person then knew the cause to be the darknesse of the bodie of the moone betwixt the sunne and our sight. But the eclipse of the moone it selfe, know what doth darken it in that sort, and how being at the full it doth sodainely lose her light, and change into so many kinde of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therefore they thought it verie strange, perswading themselues that it was a signe of some great mischiefes the goddes did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that euer determined and deliuered any thing for certaine and assured, concerning the light and darkenesse of the moone: his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity, nor was generally knowen but only to a few, who durst not talke of it but with feare euē them they trusted best. And the reason was, for that the people could not at that time abide men that professed the knowledge of naturall Philosophy, & inquired of the causes of things: them they called then Μετεωρολεσχης, as much to say, as curious inquirers, and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reason, done in heauen and in the aire. Because the people thought they ascribed that which was done by the goddes onely, vnto certaine naturall and necessarie causes, that worke their effectes not by prouidence nor will, but by force, and necessary consequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished from ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in prison: frō whence Pericles had much a do to procure his deliuery. And Socrates also, though he did not medle with that part of Philosophie, was notwithstanding put to death for the suspition thereof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessitie of naturall causes vnto the controlement and direction of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and supreame cause: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of such disputations, and gaue open passage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes schollers and friendes, an eclipse of the moone chaunced euen at the very same time that he was weying vp his anckers to saile from ZACYNTHE, to make warre with the tyrant Dionysius: being nothing affraid nor troubled therewithall, made saile notwithstanding, and when he came to SYRACVSA, draue out the tyrant. But then it fell out vnfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilfull southsaier: for the party which he was wont to vse for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this signe of the eclipse of the moone (as Philochorus saith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very good: for said he, things that men doe in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemie vnto them. But this notwithstanding, their custome was not to keepe themselues close aboue three daies in such eclipses of the moone and sunne, as Autoclides selfe preseribeth in a booke he made of such matters: where Nicias bare them then in hande, that they should tarie the whole and full reuolution of the course of the moone, as though he had not seene her straight cleere againe, after she had once passed the shadow and darkenesse of the earth. But all other things laide a side and forgotten, Nicias disposed himselfe to sacrifice vnto the goddes: vntill such time as the enemies came againe as well to besiege their fortes, and all their campe by lande, as also to occupie the whole hauen by sea. For they had not onely put men aborde into their gallies able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fisher botes and other light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble house, called Heraclides whose bote being forwarder than his companions, was in danger of taking by a gallie of the

ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Pollichus his vncle being afraid of it, lanched forth with tenne gallies of SYRACVSA for his rescue, of the which himselfe was Captaine. The other gallies doubting also least Pollichus should take hurt, came on likewise a mayne: so there fell out a great battell by sea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and slew Eurymedon Captaine, and many other. This made the souldiers of the ATHENIANS so affraid, that they beganne to crie out, it was no longer tarying there, and that there was none other way but to depart thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had wonne that battell, they had streight shut vp the hauens mouth. Nicias could not consent to such a retire. For, said he, it would be too great a shame for them to leaue their gallies and other shippes to the enemie, considering the number not to be much lesse than two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme two hundred and tenne gallies with the best and valiantest of their footmen, and darters, that were in the army, because the other gallies had spent their owers. And for the rest of the army, Nicias forsaking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Hercules) did set them in battell ray vpō the pere of the hauen. Insomuch, that the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted sacrifices vnto Hercules: did then sende their Priestes and Captaines thither to do them. The souldiers being imbarked into the gallies, the Priestes and Soothsayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoubtedly the signes of their sacrifices did promise them a noble victory, so that they gaue no charge, but onely stood vpon their defence: for so did Hercules euer ouercome, defending when he was assailed. With good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was such a hotte & cruell battell by sea, as had not beene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that stood on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, seeing the whole conflict and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themselues by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranckes of their shippes, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great shippes together, fighting with the heauie, against the enemies that were light and swift, which came on on euery side of them hurling stones at them which were made sharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS onely casting their dartes, and vsing their bowes and slings, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe, could not lightly aime to hit with the head. That maner of fight Aristo a CORINTHIAN (an excellent shippe master) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who himselfe slaine valiantly fighting, when they were conquerers. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driuen to fight, hauing susteined a maruellous slaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to flie by sea being also clearely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardly saue themselues by land: were then so discouraged, as they made no longer resistance, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their shippes, before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to burie them, taking more pity to forsake their diseased & sore wounded companions, than to bury them that were already slaine. When they considered all these things, they thought their owne state more miserable than theirs, which were to end their liues with much more cruelty, than was their misery present. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the SYRACVSANS through all the citie disposed themselues to sacrifice to the goddes, and to be merry well for the ioy of their victorie, as also for Hercules feast: thought it booteles to perturbe them, and much lesse to compell them to take armes vpon a sodaine, to set vpon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuising with himselfe how to deceiue Nicias, sent some of his friends vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from those as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all things during this warre: and willed him to take heede not to depart that night, least he fell into the ambushes which the SYRACVSANS had laid for him, hauing sent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and subtilty, staied there that night, as though he had beene affraide to fall within the danger of his enemies ambush. The next upon the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoysed saile, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the riuers mouthes, & brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsemen in a squadron in the next plaine fieldes adioyning, so that the ATHENIANS had no to escape and passe by them without fighting. At last notwithstanding, hauing staied all the day and the next night following, they put themselues in iorney, and departed with great cries & lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall country, and not out of their enemies lande: as well for the great distresse and necessity wherein they were, (lacking all things needfull to sustaine life) as also for the extreame sorow they felt to leaue their sore wounded companions and diseased kinsemen and friends behinde them, that could not for their weakenesse followe the campe, but specially for that they looked for some worse matter to fall to themselues, than that which they sawe present before their eyes to be happened to their fellowes. But of all the most pitifull sightes to beholde in that campe, there was none more lamentable nor miserable, than the person of Nicias selfe: who being tormented with his disease, and waxen very leane and pale, was also vnworthily brought to extreame want of naturall sustenance, euen when he had most neede of comfort, being very sickely. Yet notwithstanding his weaknesse and infirmitie, he tooke great paines, and suffered many things which the soundest bodies doe labour much to ouercome and suffer: making it appeare euidently to every man, that he did not abide all that paines for any respect of himself, or desire that he had to saue his owne life, so much as for their sakes in that he yeelded not vnto present despaire. For where the souldiers for very feare & sorrow burst out into teares & bitter wailing: Nicias he shewed, that if by chance he were forced at any time to doe the like, it was rather vpon remembrance of the shame and dishonour that came into his minde, to see the vnfortunate successe of this voyage, in steede of the honor and victory they hoped to haue brought home, and not for any other respect. But if to see Nicias in this misery, did moue the lookers on to pitie: it did this much more encrease their compassion, when they remembred Nicias wordes in exhortations continually to the people, to breake this iorney, and to disswade them from the enterprise of this warre. For then they plainly iudged him not to haue deserued these troubles. And furthermore, this caused the souldiers vtterly to despaire of helpe from the goddes, when they considered with themselues, that so deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honor and seruice of the goddes) had no better successe, than the most vile and wicked persons in all the whole armie. All this notwithstanding, Nicias maintained himselfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull wordes, and his kind vsing of euery man: to let them know that he fainted not vnder his burden, nor yet did yeeld to this his misfortune and extreame calamitie. And thus trauelling eight daies iorney out right together, notwithstanding that he was by the way continually set vpon, wearied and hurt: yet he euer maintained his bandes, and led them whole in company vntill that Demosthenes with all his bandes of souldiers was taken prisoner, in a certaine village called Polyzelios: where remaining behinde, he was enuironned by his enemies in fight, and hauing himselfe so compassed in, drewe out his sworde, and with his owne handes thrust him selfe thorow, but died not of it, because his enemies came straight about him, and tooke hold of him. The SYRACVSANS thereupon went with speede to Nicias, and told him of Demosthenes case. He giuing no credite to them, sent presently certaine of his horsemen thither to vnderstand the truth: who brought him word that Demosthenes and all his men were taken prisoners. Then he besought Gylippus to treate of peace, to suffer the poore remaine of the ATHENIANS to depart out of SICILE with safetie, and to take such hostages for the sure payment of all such summes of money the SYRACVSANS had disbursed by meanes of this warre, as himselfe should like himselfe: which he promised he would cause the ATHENIANS to performe & satisfie vnto them. Howbeit the SYRACVSANS would in no wise hearken to peace, but cruelly threatning and reuiling them that made motion hereof, in rage gaue a new onset vpon him, more fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then vtterly without any kind of victuals, did notwithstãding hold out that night, & marched al the next day folowing (though the enemies dartes still flew about their eares) vntill he came to the riuer of Asinarus, into the which the SYRACVSANS did forcibly driue them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, entred the riuer of themselues, thinking to drinke. But there of all others was the most cruell slaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntill such time as Nicias falling downe flat at Gylippus feete, saide thus vnto him. Since the goddes haue giuen thee (Gylippus) victorie, shew mercy, not to me that by these miseries haue won immortall honor and fame, but vnto these poore vanquished ATHENIANS: calling to thy remembrance, that the fortunes of warre are common, and how that the ATHENIANS haue vsed you LACEDEMONIANS courteously as often as fortune fauored them against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias perswaded by his words, tooke compassion of him (for he knew he was a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS at the last peace concluded betwixt them, and furthermore thought it great honor to him, if he could carie away the two Captaines or Generals of his enemies prisoners) shewed him mercy, gaue him wordes of comfort, and moreouer commaunded beforehand they should take all the residue prisoners. But his commaundement was not knowen in time to all: insomuch as there were many moe slaine than taken, although some priuate souldiers saued diuers notwithstanding by stealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought all the prisoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, first vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them hung them vp vpon the goodliest young trees that stoode vpon the riuers side in token of triumph. And so putting on triumphing garlands vpon their heades and hauing trimmed their owne horses in triumphant maner, & also shorne all the horses of their enemies: in this triumphing sort they made their entry into the citie of SYRACVSA, hauing gloriously ended the most notable warre that euer was amongst the GREEKES one against an other, and attained also the noblest victorie that could be atchieued, and that only by force of armes and valiancy. So at their returne, a councell and assembly was holden at SYRACVSA by the citizens and their confederates: in the which, Eurycles one of the orators (a practiser in publicke causes) first made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy day, without any maner of worke, or labour, but only to do sacrifice to the goddes: and that the feast should be called, Asinarus feast, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was giuen. This victory was had the sixe & twenty day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the prisoners that the confederates of the ATHENIANS had their slaues should be openly sold by the dromme: and that the naturall ATHENIANS which were free men, and their confederates of the country of SICILE, should be clapped in irons and laid in prison, the Captaines only excepted, whom they should put to death. The SYRACVSANS confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perswade them that to be mercifull in victory, would be more honor vnto them, than the victory itself, they thrust him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made sute that for the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, he might carie them aliue with him to SPARTA: he was not onely shamefully denied, but most vilely abused, so lustie were they growen vpon this victorie, beside also that in the time of the warre they were offended with him, & could not endure his straight seuere LACONIAN gouernement. Timæus saith moreouer, that they accused him of couetousnes and theft, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandrides his father was conuict for extortion, and banished ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe hauing stolen thirtie talents out of a thousande which Lysander sent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eauings of his house, being bewrayed, was compelled with shame to flie his countrie, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lysander. So Timæus writeth, that Nicias & Demosthenes were not stoned to death by the SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides and Philistus report, but that they killed themselues, vpon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the assembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men whom the keepers of the prison let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the iaile dore, for euery man to beholde. I haue heard there is a target at this present to be seene in a temple at SYRACVSA, which is said to be Nicias target, couered all ouer with golde and purple silke, passing finely wrought together. As for the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, the most of them died of sickneſſe, and of ill handling in the prison: where they had no more allowed them to liue withall but two cõtinus of barley for their bread, and one of water for ech man a day. In deede many of them were conueyed away, and sold for slaues: and many also that scaped vnknowen as slaues, were also solde for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a horse, who notwithstanding besides their bondage endured also this paine. But such, their humble patience and modestie did greatly profite them. For either shortly after they were made free men, or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated, and beloued of their maisters. Some of them were saued also for Eurypides sake: For the SICILIANS liked the verses of this Poet better, than they did any other GRECIANS verses of the middest of GREECE. For if they heard any rimes or songs like vnto his, they would haue them by hart, and one would present them to an other with great ioy. And therefore it is reported, that diuers escaping this bondage, and returning againe to ATHENS, went very louingly to salute Euripides, & to thanke him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from slauery, onely by teaching them those verses which they remembred of his workes. Others told him also, how that after the battell, they scaping by flight, and wandering vp and downe the fields, met with some that gaue them meate and drinke to sing his verses. And this is not to be maruelled at, weighing the report made of a ship of the citie of CAVNVS, that on a time being chased in thither by pyrates, thinking to saue themselues within their portes, could not at the first be receiued, but had repulse: howbeit being demanded whether they could sing any of Euripides songs, and answering that they could, were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The newes of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleeued at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the hauen of PIRÆA, went and sat him downe (as the manner is) in a barbers shop, and thinking it had bene commonly knowen there, began to talke of it. The barber hearing the stranger tell of such matter: before any other had heard of it: ranne into the citie as fast as he could, and going to the gouernours told the newes openly before them all. The Magistrates thereupon did presently call an assembly, and brought the barber before them: who being demaunded of whom he heard these newes, could make no certaine report. Whereupon being taken for a forger of newes, that without ground had put the citie in feare and trouble: he was presently bound, and layed on a wheele, whereon they vse to put offenders to death, and so was there tormented a great time, vntill at last there arriued certaine men in the citie, who brought too certaine newes thereof, and told euery thing how the ouerthrow came. So as in fine they found Nicias wordes true, which now they beleeued, when they saw all those miseries light fully vpon them, which he long before had prognosticated vnto them.

Marcus Craſſus.

Marcus Craſſus was the ſonne of a Cenſor, who had alſo receiued the honour of triumph: but himſelf was brought vp in a litle houſe with two other of his brethrē, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept houſe together. Whereupon it came to paſſe, that he was a man of ſuch ſober and temperate dyet, that one of his brethren being deceaſed, he maried his wife by whō he had children. For womē, he liued as continent a life, as any Romaine of his time: notwithſtanding, afterwardes being of riper yeares, he was accuſed by Plotinus to haue defloured one of the Veſtall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cauſe of that ſuſpitiō grew thus: Licinia had a goodly pleaſant garden hard by the ſuburbes of the citie, wherewith Craſſus was maruellouſly in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: and vpon this onely occaſion was often ſeene in ſpeach with her, which made the people ſuſpect him. But for aſmuch as it ſeemed to the iudges that couetouſneſſe was the cauſe that made him follow her, he was cleared of the inceſt ſuſpected: but he neuer left following of the Nunne, till he had got the garden of her. The Romaines ſay there was but that onely vice of couetouſneſſe in Craſſus, that drowned many other good vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, ſince it grew ſo great, as the note of that onely did hide and couer all his other vices. Now to ſet out his extreme couetous deſire of getting, naturally bred in him, I proue it by two manifeſt reaſons. The firſt, his manner and meanes he vſed to get: and the ſecond, the greatneſſe of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth then three hundred talents. And during the time that he delt in the affaires of the common wealth, he offered the tenthes of all his goods wholly vnto Hercules, kept open houſe for the people of Rome, and gaue alſo to euery citizen of the ſame as much corne as would ſerue him three monthes: & yet when he went from Rome to make warre with the Parthians, himſelfe being deſirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand one hundred talents. But if I may with licence vſe euill ſpeach, in ſetting a troth: I ſay he got the moſt part of his wealth by fire and bloud, raiſing his greateſt reuenue of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had taken the citie of Rome, he made port of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to thoſe that gaue moſt, terming them booty, onely for that he would the nobilitie, and greatest men of power in the citie should be partakers with him of this iniquitie: and in this open sale Crassus neuer left taking of giftes, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassus perceiuing that the greatest decay commonly of the buildings in ROME came by fire, and falling downe of houses, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of stories built one vpon an other: bought bondmē that were masons, carpenters, and these deuisours and builders, & of those he had to the number of fiue hundred. Afterwardes, when the fire tooke any house, he would buy the house while it was burning, and the next houses adioyning to it, which the owners sold for litle, being then in feare as they were, and a burning: so that by proces of time, the most part of the houses in ROME came to be his. But notwithstāding that he had so many slaues to his workemen, he neuer built any house from the ground, sauing his owne house wherein he dwelt: saying, that such as delighted to build, vndid themselues without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mynes of siluer, many ploughes, and a number of hyndes and ploughmen to follow them: yet all that commoditie was nothing, in respect of the profit his slaues and bondmen brought him dayly in. As readers, scriuenors, goldsmithes, bankers, receiuers, stewardes of houshold, caruers, and other such officers at the table, taking paines himselfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to instruct them what they should do: and to be short, he thought the greatest care a good housholder ought to haue, was to see his slaues or seruants well taught, being the most liuely cattell and best instruments of a mans house. And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake; that all things must be done by seruaunts, and his seruaunts must be ruled by him. For we see that the art and skill to be a good husband, when it consisteth in gouernement of things without life or sence, is but a base thing, onely tending to gaine: but when it dependeth vpon good order and gouernement of men, me thinkes then it is to know how to gouerne well a common wealth. And as his iudgement was good in the other, so was it very bad in this: that he thought no man rich, and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole armie with his owne proper goods. For warre (as king Archidamus was wont to say) is not made with any certaintie of expence: and therefore there must no sufficiencie of riches be limited for the maintenance of the same. Herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who hauing allowed euery ROMAINE fourteen acres land (called with them, Iugera) vnderstanding that some were not pleased, but would haue more, made them this answer. The gods forbid any ROMAINE should thinke fourteen land litle, which indeed is enough to suffise for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was curteous to straungers, for his house was open to them all, and he lent his friends money without interest: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he rough, and demaunde his money of them. So, his curtesie to lend many times without interest, did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vsurie. Indeede when he had any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinarie, without all excesse: but his fine and cleanly seruice, & the good entertainement he gaue euery man that came to him, pleased them better, than if he had bene more plentifull of dyet and dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefly studied eloquence, and that sort specially that best would serue his turne to speake in open audience: so that he became the best spoken man in ROME of all his time, and by his great industry and diligence indeuour excelled all them that euen by nature were most apt vnto it. For some say, he had neuer so small nor litle a cause in hand, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing studied his case before for pleading: and oftentimes also when Pompey, Cæsar, and Cicero refused to rise, and speake to matters, Crassus would defend euery cause if he were requested. And therefore was he generally beloued & well thought of, because he shewed himselfe pain-full, & willing to helpe euery man. Likewise was his gentlenesse marvellously esteemed, because he saluted euery body curteously, & made much of all men for, whom so euer he met in the streetes that spake to him as he passed and saluted him, were he neuer so meane, he would speake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is sayd also he was very well studied in stories, and indifferently seene in Philosophy, specially in Aristotles workes, which once Alexenus did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by vsing of Crassus company: for it were hard to say, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Crassus or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his friendes he would euer haue Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but so soone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to see that he making profession of Philosophie as he did, the poore man being in great pouertie, did not place pouertie in things indifferent. But hereof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and comming on directly towards ROME, euery man suspected straight their comming was for no good to the common weale, but as appeared plainly, for the death and destruction of the noblest men of ROME. For it fell out indeede, that they slue all the chiefe men they found in the citie, among whom Crassus father & his brother were of the number, and himselfe being at that time but young, escaped the present danger onely by flight. Furthermore, Crassus hearing that they layed wait to take him, and that the tyrants sought him in euery place, tooke three of his friends in his company and ten seruants onely, and fled into SPAYNE with all possible speede, where he had been with his father before, and had got some friends when he was Prætor, and ruled that country. Neuertheless, seeing euery body afrayed, and mistrusting Marius crueltie as if he had been at their doores, he durst not bewray himselfe to any man, but went into the fieldes, and hid himself in a great caue being within the land of one Vibius Piciacus by the sea side, from whence he sent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what good will he bare him, but specially for that his victuals began to faile him. Vibius hearing that Crassus was safe, and had scaped, became very glad of it: and vnderstanding how many persons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not himselfe to see him, but called one of his slaues (who was his receiuer and occupied that ground for him) and bringing him neare the place where Crassus was, commaunded him euery night to prouide meate for supper, to bring it ready dressed to this caue whereunder was the caue, & make no wordes of it, neither be inquisitiue for whom it was: for if he did, he should dye for it: and otherwise, for keeping the thing secret as he commanded, he promised to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the sea side, & is closed in round about with two rocks that meet together, which receiue a soft coole wind into them. When ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownesse therof are many other caues of great receit one within an other, and besides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of passing good water running hard by the rocke, and there are all rifts of the rockes also receiuing the light without, where they meet together, do send it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruellous light, and hath no dampe at all, but very pure and dry, by reason of the thickenesse of the rocke, which sendeth all the moisture and vapour into that springing well. Crassus keeping close in this caue, Vibius secretly brought victuals thither dayly to relieue him, and his company, but saw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderstand what they were: and yet they saw him plainly, obseruing the hour and time of his comming when he brought the same. He prouided them no more then would euen necessarily serue their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheare withall. Vibius was bent to entertaine Crassus as honorably as he could possible, in somuch as he considered he was a young man, and therefore reason would he should offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to relieue his necessitie only he thought that rather a part of feare, than any shew of loue towardes him. One day he came with two fayre young damsels, and brought them with him to the sea side: and when he came to the caue, shewed them where they should get vp, and bad them not be afrayed. Crassus at the first, when he saw the young wenches, was afrayed he had bene betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whom they sought. They being instructed by Vibius what they should say, answered, that they sought their maister that was hidden there. Then Crassus knew it was Vibius mirth to shew him curtesie: so he receiued them into his caue, and kept them so long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderstand by them what he lacked. Fenestella writeth that he saw one of them when she was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight monthes) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made himself to be knowen, there repayred a great number of souldiers vnto him, of whom he onely two thousand fiue hundred, and with them passed by many cities, and sacked one called MARACA, as diuers do write, but he flatly denied it, and stoutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwardes hauing gotten shippes together, went into AFRICKE, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great army together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honored him as much as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwardes arriuing in ITALIE, intending to imploy all the young nobility he had in his company, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and sent Crassus into the country of the MARSIANS, to leauy men of warre there. Crassus desiring certaine bandes of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to passe by his enemies: Sylla aunswered him angerly againe. I giue thee thy father, thy brother, thy friendes and kinsemen to aide those whom they most wickedly haue slaine and murthered, and whose deathes I pursue with hot reuenge of mayne army, vpon those bloudy murtherers that haue slaine them. Crassus being nettled with these wordes, departed thence presently, and stoutly passing through his enemies leauied a good number of souldiers: and was euer after ready at Syllaes commaundement in all his warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention betwixt him and Pompey. For Pompey being younger than Crassus, and borne of a wicked father in ROME, whom the people more hated thā euer they did man: came yet to great honour by his valiancy, & by the notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, which he seldome did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equals; as to rise vp when he came towardes him, to put off his cappe, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Crassus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of warre at that time, and also because these two vices that were bred in him, misery and couetousnesse, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the sacke of the citie of TVDER, which he tooke, he priuily got the most part of the spoyle to himselfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the battell of all this ciuill warre (which was the greatest and most daungerous of all other) before ROME it selfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulsed and ouerthrowen: but Crassus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his victory, and demaunded victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the confiscate goodes of the outlawes appointed to be solde for litle or nothing. And it is sayd also, that he made one an outlaw in the country of the MARSIANS, without Syllaes priuitie or commaundement onely to haue his goodes. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vse him in any open seruice. Surely this is a straunge thing, that Crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, & could creepe into any mans fauour: was yet himselfe easie to be won through flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is sayd of him that he had this propertie: that though himselfe was as extremely couetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly misliked them that had his owne humour of auarice. Pompeyes honour that he attained vnto dayly, by bearing great charge & rule in the warres, did greatly trouble Crassus: both because he obtained the honour of triumph before he came to be Senatour, & also for that the ROMAINES commonly called him, Pompeius Magnus, to say, Pompey the great. Crassus being in place on a time when one sayd that saw Pompey comming, see, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, sayd he scornefully? Howbeit despayring that he could not attaine to match him in the warres, he gaue himselfe to the affaires of the citie: and by his paines and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that sued for any office, or demaunded any thing else of the people, he attained in the end to the like estimation and authoritie that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For Pompeyes fame & power was greater in ROME, whē him selfe was absent: and contrariwise when he was there present, Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maiesty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be seene often of the people, but kept from repayring to open places, and would speake but in few mens causes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauour and credit whole for himselfe, when he stood in neede to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to many, becauſe he kept continually in the market place, and was eaſie to be repayred vnto by any man that required his helpe, dayly following thoſe exerciſes, indeuouring himſelfe to pleaſure euery man: ſo that by this eaſie acceſſe and familiaritie, for fauour and good will he grew to exceede the grauity and maieſty of Pompey. But as for the worthineſſe of their perſon, their eloquence of ſpeach, and their good grace and countenance: in all thoſe (it is ſayd) Pompey and Craſſus were both alike. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Craſſus away, with any open malice and ill will. For though he was ſory to ſee Pompey and Cæſar honoured about him: yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cæſar when he was taken by pyrates in ASIA (as he was once) and being kept priſoner cryed out aloude: O Craſſus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou ſhalt heare I am in priſon. This notwithſtanding they were afterwardes good friendes, as it appeareth. For Cæſar being ready on a time to depart out of ROME for Prætor into SPAYNE, and not being able to ſatisfie his creditours that came flocking all at once about him, to ſtay and arreſt his cariage: Craſſus in that time of need forſooke him not, but became his ſurety for the ſumme of eight hundred and thirty talents.

Three factions in Rome.

In fine, all ROME being deuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cæſar, and Craſſus for Cato, the eſtimation they had of his fidelitie was greater, than his authority: and his vertue more wondered at then practiſed. In ſomuch as the graueſt and wiſeſt men tooke part with Pompey. The liueliеſt youthes, and likelieſt to runne into deſperate attemptes, they followed Cæſars hope. Craſſus keeping the middeſt of the ſtreame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes chaunged his minde and purpoſe. For in matters of gouernement in the common weale, he neither ſhewed himſelfe a conſtant friend, nor a daungerous enemy: but for gaine was eaſily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they ſaw him prayſe and reproue, deface and condemne, the ſame lawes, and the ſame men. His eſtimation grew more, through the peoples feare of him: than for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the anſwere that one Sicinius (a very buſie headed man, and one that troubled euery gouernour of the common weale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not buſie with Craſſus amongſt the reſt: and how it happened that he ſo ſcaped his handes? O, ſayd he, he caſt hay on his horne. The manner was then at ROME, if any man had a curſt bullocke that would ſtrike with his horne, to winde hay about his head, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commotion of fenſers, which ſome call Spartacus warre, their waſting and deſtroying of ITALIE came vpon this occaſion. In the citie of CAPVA, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fenſers at vnrebated foyles, whom the ROMAINES call Gladiatores, whereof the moſt part were GAVLES & THRACIANS. Theſe were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had committed, but onely for the wickednes of their maiſter that had bought them, and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the ſharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to ſteale away: but their conſpiracie being bewrayed, three ſcore and eighteen of them entred into a cookes houſe, and with ſpittes and kitching kniues, which there they got, went quite out of the citie. By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes loden with fenſers weapons, that were brought from CAPVA going to ſome other citie: thoſe they alſo tooke by force, and arming themſelues therewith got them then to a ſtrong place of ſituation. Where amongſt themſelues they choſe three Captaines, & one Spartacus a THRACIAN borne (and of thoſe countrymen that go wandring vp and downe with their heards of beaſtes neuer ſtaying long in a place) they made their generall. This Spartacus was not onely valiant, but ſtrong made withall, and endued with more wiſedome and honeſty, than is commonly found in men of his ſtate and condition: and for ciuilitie and good vnderſtanding, a man more like to the GRECIANS, than any of his countrymen commonly be. It is reported, that whē Spartacus came firſt to ROME to be ſold for a ſlaue there was found as he ſlept, a ſnake wound about his face. His wife ſeeing it, being his own countrywoman, & a wiſe woman beſides, poſſeſt with Bacchus ſpirit of diuination: ſaid plainly that it did ſignifie, that one day he ſhould be of great power, much dread, and haue very good ſucceſſe. This ſame woman propheteſſe was then with him, and followed him likewiſe when he fled. Now firſt they ouerthrew certaine ſouldiers that came out of CAPVA against them, thinking to take them: and ſtripping them of their armour & weapons, made them make the seruers weapons, which they threw away as vile and vnseemly. After that, the Romaines sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in a certaine fort, situate vpon a hill that had a verie steepe and narrowe ascent vnto it, and kept the siege vp to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was nothing but high rocks hanging ouer, and vpon them great store of wilde vines. Of them the bondmen cut the strongest ropes, and made thereof ladders, like to these ship ladders of ropes, of such a length and so long, that they reached from the top of the hill euen to the very bottome: vpon those they came safely downe, sauing one that taried aboue to throwe downe their armor after them, who afterwards by the same ladder saued himselfe last of all. The Romaines mistrusting no harme matter, these bondmen compassed the hill round, assailed them behinde, and put them in such a feare with the sodaine onset, as they fled vpon it euery man, and so was their campe taken. Thereupon diuerse heardmen and sheapheards that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the Romaines that fled, being strong and hardy men: of which some they armed, and others they vsed as scoutes and spials to discouer. Vpon this ouerthrowe was sent an other captaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, against these bondmen: who first ouercame Furius the Lieutenant of Varinus in battell, and two thousand of his men: & after that againe they ouercame one Cossinius, and ouerthrew a great army of his, being ioyned with P. Varinus, as his fellow and counseller. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Cossinius was bathing himself at a place called the salte pits, had almost taken him tardie, hauing much a do by flight to saue himselfe: notwithstanding, Spartacus wanne all his cariage at that time, and hauing him hard in chase, tooke his whole cãpe with great slaughter of his men, among whom Cossinius self was slaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in sundry battels and encounters ouercome the Prætor himselfe, Varinus, and at the length taken his sergeants from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horse whereon he rode himselfe: was growne then to such a power, as he was feared of euery man. Yet all this notwithstanding, Spartacus wisely considering his owne case, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the Romaines: marched with his armie towards the Alpes, taking it their best way after they had passed them ouer, euery man to repaire home to his owne countrey, some into Gavle, the rest into Thracia. But his souldiers trusting to their multitude, and persuading themselues to do great things: would not obey him therein, but went againe to spoile and ouerrune all Italie. The Senate of Rome being in a great perplexitie, not onely for the shame and dishonor that their men should be ouercome in that sort by slaues and rebels, but also for the feare and danger all Italie stood in besides: sent both the Consulles together, Gelius and Lentulus, vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Consuls, setting sodainly vpõ a band of the Germaines, which in a braue and contempt as it were, dispearsed themselues from their campe, put them to the sworde euery man. Lentulus, his colleague & fellow Consull on the other side, campassed in Spartacus and with a great armie. but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the army, gaue them battell, ouerthrew them, and tooke all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on still with his armie towards the Alpes, Cassius the Prætor, and Gouernor of Gavle about the Po, came against him with an armie of ten thousand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Cassius hauing lost a great number of his men, with great difficultie saued himselfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Cassius ouerthrow, were maruellously offended with the Cõsuls, and sent commaundement vnto them, to leaue off the warre: and thereuppon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcus Crassus, who was accompanied in this iorney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houses, both for that he was maruellously esteemed, and also for the good will they bare him. Now went Crassus from Rome, and camped in Romania, tarying Spartacus comming, who was marching thitherward. He sent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetche a compasse about to intrappe the enemie behinde, straightly commanding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no case to offer him skirmish nor battell. But Mummius notwithstanding this straight commaundement, seeing some hope giuen him to doe good, set vpon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrowe, slue numbers of his men, and moe had slaine, sauing that certaine of them saued themselues by flight, hauing only loſt their armor and weapons. Hereupon Craſſus was grieuouſly offended with Mummius, and receiuing his ſouldiers that fled, gaue them other armour and weapons, but yet vpon ſureties, that they ſhould keepe them better thencefoorth, than they had before done. Now Craſſus of the fiue hundred that were in the firſt ranckes, and that firſt fled, them he deuided into fiftie times ten, and out of euery one of thoſe he put one of them to death by lot fell out: renuing againe the ancient diſcipline of the ROMAINES to puniſh cowardly ſouldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vſe. For it is a kinde of death that bringeth open ſhame withall, and becauſe it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the reſt due afraide to ſee the terror of this puniſhment. Craſſus hauing done execution in this ſort vpon his men, led his armie againſt Spartacus: who ſtill drue backe, vntill he came to the ſea ſide through the country of the LVCANIANS, where he found in the ſtraight of the Farre of MESSINA, certaine pirats ſhips of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And hauing put two thouſand men into SICILE, he then reuiued the warre there of the ſlaues, which was but in maner newly ended, and lacked ſmall prouocation to begin it againe. But theſe pirats hauing promiſed Spartacus to paſſe him ouer thither, and alſo taken giftes of him, deceiued him, and brake their promiſe. Whereupon Spartacus returning back againe from the ſea ſide, went and camped within a litle Ile of the RHEGIANS. Craſſus comming thither to ſeeke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he ſhould do: determined with a wall to choke vp the bar or channell entring into this litle Iland, both to keepe his men occupied from idleneſſe, and his enemies alſo from victuall. This was a maruellous huge and long peece of worke, notwithſtanding, Craſſus finiſhed it beyond all mens expectation in a very ſhort time, and brought a trenche from one ſide of the ſea to the other ouerthwart the barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteene foote broade, and ſo many in height: and vpon the top of this trenche built a high wall, of a maruellous ſtrength, whereat Spartacus at the firſt made light account, and laughed at it. But when pillage began to faile him, & trauelling all about the Ile for victuals, perceiuing himſelf to be ſhut in with this wall, and that there was no kinde of victuals to be had within all the compaſſe of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boiſterous night, the winde being very great, when it ſnowed exceedingly, ſet his men a worke, and filled vp a peece of the trenche (being a ſmall breadth) with earth, ſtones, and boughes of tree, whereupon he paſſed ouer the third part of his army. Craſſus at the firſt then became afraide, leaſt Spartacus would haue taken his way directly vpwarde ROME: but he was ſoone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling againſt Spartacus, went & camped by themſelues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by reporte hath this variable propertie, that in certaine times it changeth and becommeth very ſweete, and at ſome other times againe ſalt and brackiſh, as no man can drinke it. Craſſus going to ſet vpon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very farre: becauſe Spartacus came preſently to the reſcue with his armie, who ſtayed the chaſe. Craſſus had written letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, & Pompey out of SPAINE, when of he then repented him, and made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to end this warre, leaſt either of them came thither: knowing, that which of them ſo euer came to his helpe, to him would the people giue the honour of ending this warre, and not to him ſelfe. Wherefore he firſt determined to aſſaile them that had reuolted from Spartacus, and camped by themſelues, who were led by Caius Canisius, and an other called Caſtus. So Craſſus ſent ſix thouſand footmen before to take a hill, commaunding them to lie as cloſe as they could, that their enemies might not diſcouer them: and ſo they did, and couered their morians and headpeeces as well as might be, from being ſeene. Neuertheleſſe they were diſcouered by two women doing ſacrifice for the ſafetie of their armie: and thereupon were all in great hazard of caſting away, had not Craſſus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruelleſt battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were ſlaine of the ſlaues at that battell, twelue thouſand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the reſt ſlaine in the place of their ranckes, valiantly fighting where they were ſet in battell ray. Spartacus after this ouerthrowe, drew towards the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintius me of Crassus Lieutenants, and Scrofa his treasurer followed him, still skirmishing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned sodainly vpon them, made the ROMAINES flie that stil harried his men in that sort, and hurt Scrofa Crassus treasurer so sore, that he hardly escaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMAINS by this ouerthrow, fell out in the ende to the vtter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitive bondmen, grew to such a stoutnesse and pride of themselues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines: but by the way as they went, they compassed them in with their weapons, and tolde them, that they should go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through LVCANIA against the ROMAINES. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had receiued newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuers were suters for him at ROME to be sent in this iorney, saying, that the last victory of this warre was due to him, and that he would dispatche it at a battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as neere the enemie as he could, and made his men one day cast a trenche, which the bondmen seeking to preuent, came with great furie, & set vpon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hotte skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side: so that Spartacus in the ende perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had set them in order, and that they brought him his horse he was wonte to fight on: he drew out his sworde, and before them all slue the horse dead in the place, saying: if it be my fortune to winne the field, I know I shall haue horse enow to serue my turne: and if I chance to be ouercome, then shall I need no more horses. After that, he flew in among the ROMAINS, thinking to attaine to fight with Crassus, but he could not come neere him: yet he slue with his owne hands two ROMAINE Centurions that resisted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forsooke him and fled, so as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Crassus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had shewed himselfe a noble and valiant Captaine, venturing his person in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honour of ending this warre: for the slaues that escaped from this last battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeyes hands, who made an end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus had ouercome the slaues in battell, but that he him selfe had pulled vp that warre euen by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into ROME, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conquest of SPAYNE. Crassus also sued not for the great triumphe, neither thought he the small Ouation triumphe a foote, which they granted him, any honour vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this small triumphe, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it differeth from the great triumphe: see Marcellus life, where we haue at large discoursed thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Consull: Crassus, though he stood in good hope to be chosen Consull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer desirous to make Crassus beholding to him: wherupon he delt friendly for him, and spake openly in the assemblie of the city, that he would no lesse thanke the people to appoint Crassus his companion and fellow Consull with him, then for making himselfe Consull. But notwithstanding they were both Consuls together in office, their friendship held not, but were euer at iarre, and the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship, without any memorable act done: sauing that Crassus made a great sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feast for the people of ROME of a thousand tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to finde him three moneths. But in the ende of their Consulship, at a common councell holden, there was a knight of ROME called Onatius Aurelius: (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the state, and kept most in the country) who getting vp to the pulpit for orations: told the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame. Iupiter, said he, appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus and Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the wordes, but the people commaunded them to be friends. Pompey sate still, and saide neuer a word to it. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, & turning him to the people, tolde them alowd: my Lords of ROME, I do nothing vnworthy of my selfe, to seeke Pompeys friendship and fauour first, since you your selues haue called him the great, before he had any haire vpon his face, and that ye gaue him the honor of triumphe, before he was Senatour. And this is all that Crassus did of any account in his Consulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any acte done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goods: although Luctatius Catulus was his colleague and fellow Censor, as gentle a person as any of that time that liued in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entry into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent acte to bring EGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMAINES, Catulus did stoutly withstand him: whereby dissention falling out betwene them, they both did willingly resigne their office. In that great conspiracie of Catiline, which in manner ouerthrew the whole state and commonwealth of ROME, Crassus was had in some iealousie and mistrust: because there was one of the conspirates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credit vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassus & Cæsar, as confederats with Catiline: howbeit this oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made also, when his office and authority of Consul ceased, he said: that Crassus came one night to him, & shewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meane of his sonne. For Publius Crassus much fauouring eloquence, and being giuen to the booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in such sorte, that vpon his banishment he put on changed garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youthes to do the like also, and in fine, persuaded his father to become his friend. Cæsar now returning to ROME from the prouince he had in gouernement, intended to sue for the Consulship: and perceiuing that Pompey and Crassus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with himselfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his sute, he should but procure the other his enemy: and minding therfore to attaine his desire with the fauor of them both, sought first the meanes to make them friends, and persuaded with them, that by their controuersie the one seeking the others vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authoritie, who of themselues were of no power, if they two ioined in friendship together: for making both their friends & factions one, they might rule the state and commonwealth euen as they would. Cæsar hauing by his persuasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made themselues vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the destruction of the people and Senate of ROME. For he made them not onely greater than they were before, the one by the others meanes: but himselfe also of great power through them. For when they began to fauour Cæsar, he was straight chosen Consull without any deniall: and so behaued himselfe in his Consulship, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then sent him to gouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may say, euen themselues to put him into the cattel that should keepe all the citie in subiection: imagining that they two should make spoile and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a gouernment. Now for Pompey the cause that made him commit this error was nothing else, but his extreame ambition. But as for Crassus, besides his old vice of couetousnesse rooted in him, he added to that a new auarice and desire of triumphes and victories, which Cæsars fame for prowesse and noble actes in warres did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwise his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferior: which furie tooke such holde as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the commonwealth to great misery. Thus Cæsar being come out of his prouince of GAVLE vnto LVCA, diuerse ROMAINES went thither to see him, and among other Pompey and Crassus. They hauing talked with him in secret, agreed among them to deuise to haue the whole power of ROME in their hands: so that Cæsar should keepe his armie together, and Crassus and Pompey should take other prouinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus should againe sue the second time to be Consuls, and that Cæsars friends at ROME should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of choosing the Consuls. Thereupon Pompey and Crassus returned to ROME to that ende, but not without suspition of their their practise: for there ranne a rumor in the citie, that their meeting of Cæsar in Lvca, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he went to make sute to be Consull. Pompey aunswered them: peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the same question: he aunswered, he would sue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeys answers were thought very proud & haughty. How- beit Crassus aunswered more modestly, that if he saw it necessarie for the commonwealth, he would sue to be Consull: if not, that he would not stand for it. Vpon these words, some were bolde to make sute for the Consulship, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left off their sute for feare of them; Domitius only excepted: whome Cato so prayed and intreated, as his kinseman and friend, that he made him to seeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and saw that it was not the Consulship Crassus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyranny: and that they sued not for the office, but to get such prouinces and armies into their hands as they desired, vnder colour and countenance of the Consulship. Cato bringing these words into their eares, and beleeuing it certainly to be true as he said, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men ioyned with thē: because they wondred what the matter meant that these two noble men should sue the second time to be Consuls, and why they made sute to be ioyned together, and not to haue any other with them, considering there were so many other worthie men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he should be preuented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to choose the Consuls, Domitius going earely in the morning before day, accompanied with his friends to the place where the election should be: his man that caried the torche before him was slaine, by some whom Pompey had laid in waite, and many of his companie hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus dispersed them, he beset a house rounde about whither they fled for succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market place, and hue some of them that resisted and would not flie. They also then prolonged Cæsars gouernment of the Gavles for fiue yeares more, and procured for themselues by decree of the people, the countries of Syria and Spaine. Againe, when they drew lots together, Syria fell to Crassus, and Spaine to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one side were loth Pompey should go farre from Rome: and himself also louing his wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so neere her, that he might remaine the most of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other reioyced most at his hap, that he should go into Syria: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iourney, were he in neuer so great or strange company. Furthermore, being among his friends and familiars, he would giue out such fonde boasts of it, as no young man could haue made greater vauntes: which was cleane contrary to his yeares and nature, hauing liued all his life time as modestly, and with as small ostentation as any man liuing. But then forgetting himselfe too much, had such fonde conceits in his head, as he not only hoped after the conquest of Syria, and of the Parthians, but flattered himselfe that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the Bactrians, the Indians, and the great Ocean sea toward the East, though in the decree passed by the people, there was no mention made of any warres against the Parthians. Now euery man saw Crassus ambition and greedie desire of honor: insomuch as Cæsar himselfe wrote vnto Crassus out of Gavle, commending his noble intent and forwardnesse, and wished him to goe thorow therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederates with him to further his purpose, who much misliked that any man of a brauery & lustines should make war with any nation or people that had no way offended the Romaines, but were their friends & confederates) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, praied Pompey to assist and accompany him out of the city, because he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then.

Atteius the Tribune, against Crassus departure

For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his departure, and to crie out vpon him: yet when they saw Pompey go before him, with a pleasant smyling countenance, they quieted themselues, and made a lane for them, suffering them to passe on, and said nothing. This notwithstanding, Atteius the Tribune stepped before them, and commaunded Crassus he should not depart the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commanded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, and to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the officer to do it. So the sergeant dismissed Crassus. Then Atteius running towards the gate of the city, got a chafingdish with coles, and set it in the middest of the streete. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certaine perfumes, and made sprinclings ouer it, pronouncing horrible curses, and calling vpon terrible and strange names of gods. The ROMAINES say that those manner of curses are very auncient, but yet very secret, and of so great force: he that is once cursed with that curse can neuer escape it, nor he that vseth it dooth euer prosper after it. And therefore fewe men do vse it, and neuer but vpon vrgent occasion. But then they much reproued Atteius, for vsing of these dreadfull ceremonies and extreame curses, which were much hurtefull to the commonwealth, although he for his countries sake had thus cursed Crassus. Crassus setting forward notwithstanding, sailed on, and arriued at BRYNDVSIVM, when winter stormes had not left the seas, and he had lost many of his ships: howbeit he landed his army, and marched through the country of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man and yet building a new city: and to taunt him pretily, said vnto him, What, O king, begin you to builde now in the afternoone? To whom the king of the GALATIANS againe smiling made aunswer. And truely Syr Captaine, you goe not very early (me thinkes) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Crassus was threescore and vpward, and yet his face made him seeme elder then he was. But to our story againe. Crassus being come into the country, had as good luck as he looked for: for he easily built a bridge vpon the riuer of Euphrates, and passed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So entring into MESOPOTAMIA, receiued many cities, that of good will yeelded themselues vnto him. Howbeit there was one city called ZENODOTIA, wherof Appolonius was tyrant, whom Crassus lost a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke it by force, sacked their goods, and solde the prisoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this citie ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Imperator, to say, soueraigne Captaine: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a base minde, as one that had small hope to attaine to great things, making such reckoning of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seauen thousand of his foote men in garrison, in those cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thousand horsmen: he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his sonne Publius Crassus to him out of GAVLE from Iulius Cæsar, who had giuen him such honours, as Generals of ROME did vse to giue to valiant souldiers for rewarde of their good seruice: and brought vnto his father a thousand men of armes, all choise men. This me thinkes was the greatest fault Crassus committed in all his enterprise of that warre. For when he should presently haue gone on still, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, & gaue them leisure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, seeming rather to leade a marchants life, than a chiefetaines. For he neuer sawe his armie, nor trained them out to any martiall exercise, but fell to counting the reuenue of the cities, and was many daies busily occupied weying of the golde and siluer in the temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that: he sent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furnish him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would discharge them for a summe of money. All these things made him to be both ill spoken of, & despised of euery body. The first token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddesse Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Iuno, and others, that she is the mother and chiefe cause that giueth beginning of moisture to euery thing that commeth forth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cause also of euery good thing. both, were comming out of the temple: Crassus the younger fell first on his face, and the father afterwardes vpon his sonne. Likewise as he was gathering his garrisons together, calling them out of the cities into the field, there came Ambassadours vnto him from Arsaces, king of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their message in few words, and told him, that if this army he brought came from the ROMAINES to make warre with their maister, then that he would haue no peace nor friendship with them, but would make mortall warres against them. Further, if it were (as he had heard say) that Crassus against the peoples mindes of ROME, for his owne couetous desire, and peculiar profite was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their countrey; then in that respect Arsaces would deale more fauorably, in consideration of Crassus yeares, and was contented also to suffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in prison, then in garrison within his cities. Thereto Crassus coragiously aunswered, that he would make them aunswere in the city of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagises one of the eldest Ambassadors fell a laughing, and shewing Crassus the palme of his hand, told him thus: hair will sooner grow in the palme of my hand, Crassus, then you will come to SELEVCIA. In this sort the Ambassadors tooke their leaue of Crassus, and returned to their king Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane space, certaine of Crassus souldiers whom he had left in garrison in the cities of MESOPOTAMIA, hauing scaped maruellous daungerously and with great difficulty: brought him newes of importance, hauing themselues seene the wonderfull great campe of the enemy, and their maner of fight in the assaults they made to the cities where they lay in garrison. And, as it falleth out commonly among men escaped from any daunger, making things more fearefull and daungerous then they be in deede: they reported that it was vnpossible by flying to saue themselues, if they did follow in chase: neither to ouertake them also, if they fled. And further, that they had such kinde of arrowes as would flie swifter, then a mans eye could discerne them, and would pearce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who shot them. Besides, for the horsemens weapons they vsed, that they were such, as no armour could possibly hold out: and their armors on the other side made of such a temper and metall, as no force of any thing could pearce them through. The ROMAINES hearing these newes, fell from their former stoutnes and courage, being borne in hand before, that the PARTHIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, whom Lucullus had ouercome and spoiled so oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made account, that their greatest paines in this warre, was but the tediousnes of the iourney they had to make, and the trouble they should haue to follow those men that would not abide them. But then contrarie to expectation, they looked to come to strokes, and to be lustely fought withall. Hereupon, diuers Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Cassius the treasurer was one) aduised Crassus to stay, and to deliberate in councell to know whether he were best to goe on, or to remaine where he was. The Soothsaiers them selues did partly let Crassus vnderstand, that the goddes shewed no good tokens in all their sacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Crassus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only listned to them that counselled him to make hast. Yet Crassus chiefest comfort and incoragement, was of Artabazes, king of ARMENIA, who came to his campe with fiue thousand horse, which were but onely the kings cornet and guard. Againe he promised him other tenne thousand horsemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thousand footemen which he kept continually in pay, and counselled Crassus to enter the PARTHIANS country vpon ARMENIAES side: because his campe should not onely haue plenty of victuals, which he would send him out of his country, but for that he should also march in more safety, hauing a countrey full of mountaines and wods before him very ill for horsemen, which was the onely strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Crassus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, & al his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iorney through MESOPOTAMIA, where he had left many good souldiers of the ROMAINS. And thus departed the king of ARMENIA from him. But now as Crassus was passing his army vpō the bridge he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, there fell out sodaine strange and terrible cracks of thunder, with fearefull flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke cloude

came a wonderfull ſtorme and tempeſt of winde vpon the bridge, that the maruellous force thereof ouerthrew a great part of the bridge, and carried it quite away. Beſides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twiſe ſtriken with two great thunder clappes. One of his great horſe in like caſe, being brauely furniſhed and ſet out, tooke the bit in his teeth, and leapt into the riuer with his rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and neuer ſeene after. They ſay alſo, that the firſt Eagle and enſigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it ſelfe, without any handes layed vppon it. Further it fortuned that as they were diſtributing the victuals vnto the ſouldiers, after they had all paſſed ouer the bridge, the firſt thing that was giuen them, was ſalt, and water lintels, which the ROMAINES take for a token of death and mourning, becauſe they vſe it at the funerals of the dead. After all this, when Craſſus was exhorting his ſouldiers, a word ſcaped his mouth that troubled the army maruellouſly. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which hee had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, of purpoſe, becauſe there ſhould not a man of them returne backe againe. Wherein deede when he had ſeene that they tooke this word in ill part, he ſhould haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, ſeeing his men ſo amazed therewith: but he made light of it, he was ſo wilfull. In the end he made ordinary ſacrifice for the purging of his army: and when the Soothſayer gaue him the intrailes of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, they fell out of his handes. Craſſus perceiuing that the ſtanders by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them, you ſee what age is: yet ſhall you not ſee my ſword fall out of my hand. So hauing ended his ſacrifice, he beganne to march forward into the countrey by the riuer ſide, with ſeuen legions of footemen, and little lacke of foure thouſand horſe, and in manner as many ſhot and ſlings lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his ſkoutes that had viewed the countrey, and told him there was not an enemy to be ſeen in the field: howbeit that they had found the tracke of a maruellous number of horſe, which ſeemed as they were returned backe. Then Craſſus firſt of all beganne to hope well: and his ſouldiers alſo, they fell to deſpiſe the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Caſſius his treaſurer euer perſwaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refreſh his army a litle in one of the cities where he had his garriſon, vntill ſuch time as he heard more certain news of the enemies: or elſe that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riuers ſide, which lay fit for him to victuall himſelfe eaſily by botes that would alwaies follow his campe, and ſhould be ſure beſides that the enemies could not enuiron him behind, ſo that hauing no way to ſet vpon them but before, they ſhould haue none aduantage of them. Craſſus going about then to conſult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine ſubtill fellow, which was the greateſt miſchiefe and euill that fortune could ſend to Craſſus at that preſent time, to bring him to vtter ruine and deſtruction. For there were ſome of Craſſus ſouldiers that had ſerued Pompey before in that countrey, who knew him very well, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleaſures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMAINES. But Ariamnes had bene laboured at that time by the king of PARTHIAES Captains, and was won by them to deceiue Craſſus, and to entiſe him all he could, to draw him from the riuer and the woddy countrey, & to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compaſſe him in with their horſemen: for their determent nothing leſſe then to fight with the ROMAINES at the ſwordes point. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes comming to Craſſus, did highly praiſe and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent ſpoken man) and extolled Craſſus army, reproouing him that he came ſo ſlowly forward, tracting time in that ſort as he did, preparing himſelfe as though he had neede of armor and weapon, and not of feete and hands ſwift and ready againſt the enemies: who (for the chiefeſt of them) had of long time occupied themſelues to flie with their beſt moueables, towards the deſerts of SCYTHIA and HYRCANIA. Therefore if you determine (ſaid he) to fight, it were good you made haſt to meete them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For now you haue but Surena and Syllaces, two of his Lieutenaunts againſt you, whom he hath ſent before to ſtay you that you follow him not: and for the king him ſelfe, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lied in all. For king Hyrodes had deuided his army in two partes at the firſt, whereof him ſelfe tooke the one, and went to spoile the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surena against the ROMAINES, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdaine to come to battel with him, being one of the chiefest noble men of ROME, & to thinke it more honorable to make warre with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpose to auoide the greater daunger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with safety see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turne the ROMAINES backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the second person of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputation, valure, and experience in warres, the chiefest of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena, whē he did but remoue into the country only with his houshold, had a thousand camels to cary his sumpters, and two hundred coches of Curtisans; a thousand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many moe besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine and court made aboue ten thousand horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancesters, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the roiall crown or diademe vpon the kings head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrodes that then raigned, to his crowne, who had bene before driuen out of his realme: and had wonne him also the great city of SELEVCIA, him selfe being the first man that scaled the wals, and ouerthrew them with his owne handes that resisted him. And though he was vnder thirty yeares of age, yet they counted him a wise man, as well for his counsell, as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus. Who through his rashnes and folly at the first, and afterwards for very feare and timerousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Crassus to beleeue all that he said, and drawen him by perswasion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine country, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sandes where their feete suncke deepe, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could discerne by eye, so that not onely extreame thirst, and miserable way maruellously amazed the ROMAINS, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that, aboue all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For, neither far nor neare any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, grasse, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endlesse sea of desert sandes on euery side, round about their campe. Then beganne they to suspect that they were betraied. Again, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his country with a great war king Hyrodes made vpon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towardes ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwaies keep the woddy country, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountaines: Crassus was so wilfull, as he would write no aunswere to it, but angrily told the messenger, that he had no leysure then to hearken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwardes he would be reuenged well enough of Artabazes treason. Cassius his treasurer was much offended with Crassus for this answere: howbeit perceiuing he could do no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in euill part, he said vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARMENIANS a side, he rebuked him roundly, and said: O thou wretch, what cursed deuill hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly hast thou bewitched & charmed Crassus: that thou hast made him bring his army into this endlesse desert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captaine of theeues, then for a Generall and Consull of the ROMAINES? Ariamnes being crafty and subtil, speaking gently vnto Cassius, did comfort him, and prayed him to haue patience, and going and comming by the bandes, seeming to helpe the souldiers, he told them merily: O my fellowes, I beleeue you thinke to marche through the countrey of Naples, and looke to meete with your pleasaunt springs, goodly groues of wodde, your naturall bathes, and the good innes round about to refreshe you, and doe not remember that you passe through the desertes of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMAINES a while: but afterwardes he dislodged betimes, before he was openly knowen for a traitor, and yet not without Crassus priuity, whom he bare in hand that he would goe set some broile and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his tent not in his coate armor, of scarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMAINE Generals) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring him selfe, he straight chaunged it againe. It is saied moreouer, that the ensigne bearers when they should march away, had much a doe to plucke their ensignes out of the ground, they stucke so fast. But Crassus scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to march forward, compelling the footemen to goe as fast as the horsemen, till a few of their skowtes came in, whom they had sent to discouer: who brought newes how the enemies had slaine their fellowes, and what a doe they had them selues to scape with life, and that they were a maruellous great army, and well appointed to giue them battell. This newes made all the campe afraied, but Crassus selfe more then the rest, so as he beganne to set his men in battell ray, being for hast in maner besides him selfe. At the first following Cassius minde, he set his ranckes wide, casting his souldiers into a square battell, a good way a sunder one from an other, because hee would take in as much of the plaine as he could, to keepe the enemies from compassing them in, and so deuided the horsemen into the wings. Yet afterwardes he chaunged his minde againe, and straighted the battell of his footemen, fashioning it like a bricke, more long then broad, making a front, and shewing their faces euery way, For there were twelue cohorts or ensignes imbatteled on either side, and by euery cohort a company of horse, because there should be no place left without aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be a like defended. Then he gaue Cassius the leading of one wing, his sonne Publius Crassus the other, and him selfe led the battell in the middest. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Balissus where there was no great store of water, but yet happily lighted on for the souldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painefull way, where they had meete with no water before. There the most part of Crassus Captaines thought best to campe all night, that they might in the meane time finde meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Crassus yeelding to his sonnes and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to march on with his army, and to set vpon the enemy presently: commaunded, that such as would eate, should eate standing, keeping their ranckes. Yet on the sodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole army, he commaunded them againe to march, not faire and softly as when they go to giue battell, but with speede, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the ROMAINES at the first to be so great a number, neither so brauely armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpose hid them with certaine troupes he sent before: and to hide their bright armors, he had cast cloakes and beasts skins vpon them, but when both the armies approached neare the one to the other, and that the signe to giue charge was lift vp in the aire: first they filled the fielde with a dreadfull noise to heare. For the PARTHIANS doe not encorage their men to fight with the sound of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboies, but with great kettle drums hollow within, and about them they hang litle bels and copper rings, & with them they all make a noise euery where together, and it is like a dead sound, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wilde beast, & a fearefull noise as if it thundered, knowing that hearing is one of the sences that sooneste moueth the heart and spirit of any man, and maketh him sooneste besides him selfe. The ROMAINES being put in feare with this dead sound, the PARTHIANS straight threw the clothes & couerings from them that hid their armor, & then shewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempered steele, that glared like fire, & their horses barbed with steele and copper. And Surena also, General of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a personage, and as valiant, as any other in all his hoast, though his beauty somewhat effeminate, in iudgement shewed small likelihood of any such corage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the fashion of the MEDES, contrary to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their hair grow after the fashion of the TARTARES, without cõbing or tricking of them, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the first thought to haue set vpon the ROMAINES with their pikes, to see if they could breake their first ranckes. But when they drew neare, and saw saw the depth of the ROMAINES battell standing close together, firmely keeping their rancks: then they gaue backe, making as though they fled, and dispersed them selues. But the ROMAINES maruelled when they found it contrary, and that it was but a deuise to enuiron them on euery side. Whereupon Crassus commanded his shot and light armed men to assaile them, the which they did: but they went not farre, they were so beaten in with arrowes, and driuen to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both feared and troubled the ROMAINES, when they saw the vehemency and great force of the enemies shot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it neuer so hard or soft. The PARTHIANS thus still drawing backe, shot al together on euery side, not a foro hand, but at aduenture: for the battell of the ROMAINES stoode so neare together, as if they would, they could not misse the killing of some. These bowmen drew a great strength, and had big strong bowes, which sent the arrowes from them with a wonderful force. The ROMAINS by means of these bowes were in hard state. For if they kept their rancks, they were grieuously wounded: againe if they left them, and sought to run vpon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand with them, they saw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme them selues. For, as fast as the ROMAINES came vpon them, so fast did the PARTHIANS flie from them, and yet in flying continued still their shooting: which no nation but the SCYTHIANS could better doe then they, being a matter in deede most greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they best doe saue them selues, and fighting still, they thereby shunne the shame of that their flying. The ROMAINES still defended them selues, and held it out, so long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leaue fighting, when they had spent their arrowes or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderstoode that there were a great number of camels loden with quiuers full of arrowes, where the first that had bestowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Crassus seeing no end of their shotte, began to faint, and sent to Publius his sonne, willing him in any case to charge vpon the enemies, and to giue on set, before they were compassed in on euery side. For it was on Publius side, that one of the wings of the enemies battell was neareste vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe to compasse them behinde. Whereuppon Crassus sonne taking thirteene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thousand were of the men of armes whom Iulius Cæsar sent) and fiue hundred shot, with eight ensignes of footemen hauing targets, most neare to the place where him selfe then was: he put them out in bredth, that wheeling about they might giue a charge vpon them that rode vp and downe. But they seeing him comming, turned straight their horse and fled, either because they met in a marishe, or else of purpose to beguile this young Crassus, minding him thereby as farre from his father as they could. Publius Crassus seeing them flie, cried out, these men will not abide vs, and so spurred on for life after them: so did Censorinus and Megabacchus with him (tho one a Senatour of ROME a very eloquent man, the other a stout coragious valiant man of warre) both of them Crassus well approued friendes, and in maner of his owne yeares. Now the horsemen of the ROMAINES being trained out thus to the chase, their footemen also would not abide behinde, nor shew them selues to haue lesse hope, ioy and corage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had bene won, and that there was no more to do, but to follow the chase till they were gone farre from the army, and then they found the deceit. For the horsemen that fled before them, sodainely turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set vpon them. Whereuppon they staied, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were so few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they sette out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, and made their light horsemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who gallowping vp and down the plaine, whirled vp the sand hils from the bottome with their horse feete, which raised such a wonderfull dust, that the ROMAINES could scarce see or speake one to an other. For they being shut vp into a litle roome, and standing close one to another, were sore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguish and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting them selues vppon the sand, they brake the arrowes sticking in them. Againe, striuing by force to plucke out the forked arrowe heades, that had pearced farre into their bodies through their vains and sinewes: thereby they opened their woundes wider, and ſo caſt them ſelues away. Many of them died thus miſerably martyred: and ſuch as died not, were not able to defend them ſelues. Then when Publius Craſſus prayed and beſought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horſe, they ſhewed him their hands faſt nailed to their targets with arrowes, and their feete likewiſe ſhot through and nailed to the ground: ſo as they could neither flie nor yet defend them ſelues. Thereupon him ſelfe encoraging his horſemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valiantly ſet vpon the enemies, but it was with too great diſaduantage, both for offence, and alſo for defence. For him ſelfe and his men with weake and light ſtaues, brake vpon them that were armed with curaces of ſteele, or ſtiffe leather iackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrary maner with mighty ſtrong pikes gaue charge vpon theſe GAVLES, which were either vnarmed, or elſe but lightly armed. Yet thoſe were they in whom Craſſus moſt truſted, hauing done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they receiued the PARTHIANS pikes in their handes, and tooke them about the middels, and threw them off their horſe, where they lay on the ground, and could not ſturre for the weight of their harneſſe: and there were diuerſe of them alſo that lighting from their horſe, lay vnder their enemies horſe bellies, and thruſt their ſwordes into them. Their horſe flinging and bounding in the aire for very paine threw their maſters vnder feete, & their enemies one vpon an other, and in the end fell dead among them. Moreouer, extreame heate and thirſt did maruellouſly comber the GAVLES, who were vſed to abide neither of both: and the moſt part of their horſe were ſlaine, charging with all their power vpon the men at armes of the PARTHIANS, and ſo ranne them ſelues in vpon the points of their pikes. At the length they were driuen to retire towards their fotemen, and Publius Craſſus among them, who was very ill by reaſon of the woundes he had receiued. And ſeeing a ſand hill by chaunce not farre from them, they went thither, and ſetting their horſe in the middeſt of it, compaſſed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defend them ſelues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the countrey being plaine, they in the formoſt rankes did ſomewhat couer them behinde, but they that were behinde, ſtanding higher then they that ſtoode formoſt (by reaſon of the nature of the hil that was higheſt in the middeſt) could by no meanes ſaue them ſelues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miſery and misfortune, that muſt needes die without reuenge, or declaration of their valiancy. At that preſent time there were two GRECIANS about Publius Craſſus, Hieronymus, and Nicomachus, who dwelt in thoſe quarters, in the city of CARRE. they both counſelled P. Craſſus to ſteale away with them, and to flie to a city called ISCHNE, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMAINES part. But P. aunſwered them, that there was no death ſo cruell as could make him forſake them, that died for his ſake. When he had ſo ſayd, wiſhing them to ſaue them ſelues, he embraced them, and tooke his leaue of them: and being very ſore hurt with the ſhot of an arrow through one of his handes, commanded one of his gentlemen to thruſt him through with a ſword, and ſo turned his ſide to him for that purpoſe. It is reported Cenſorinus did the like. But Megabacchus ſlue him ſelfe with his owne handes, and ſo did the moſt part of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got vp the ſand hill, and fighting with them, thruſt them through with their ſpeares and pikes, and tooke but fiue hundred priſoners. After that, they ſtroke off Publius Craſſus head, and thereupon returned ſtraight to ſet vpon his father Craſſus, who was then in this ſtate. Craſſus the father, after he had willed his ſon to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purſued the chaſe: & perceiuing alſo that they that remained in their great battell, did not preaſe vpon him ſo neare as they did before, becauſe that a great number of them were gone after the other for reſcue: he then began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men cloſe, retyred with them the beſt he could by a hill ſide, looking euer that his ſonne would not be long before that hee returned from the chaſe. But Publius ſeeing him ſelfe in daunger, had ſent diuerſe meſſengers to his father, to aduertiſe him of his diſtreſſe, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and ſlue by the way: and the laſt meſſengers he ſent, ſcaping very hardly, brought Craſſus newes, that his ſonne was but caſt away, if he did not preſently aide him, and that with a great power. Theſe newes were grieuous to Craſſus in two reſpects: firſt for the feare he had, ſeeing him ſelfe in daunger to loſe all: and ſecondly secondly for the vehement desire he had to goe to his sonnes helpe. Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power, to the rescue of his sonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his sonnes ouerthrow, with a more dreadfull noyse and crie of victorie, than euer before: and thereupon their deadly sounding droms filled the aire with their wonderfull noise. The ROMAINES then looked straight for a hot allarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Crassus head vpon the point of a lance, comming neere to the ROMAINES, shewed them his head, and asked them in derision, if they knew what house he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (said they) that so noble and valiant a young man, should be the sonne of so cowardly a father, as Crassus. The sight of Publius Crassus head killed the ROMAINES hearts more, than any other daunger they had bene in at any time in all the battell. For it did not set their hearts a fire as it should haue done, with anger, and desire of reuenge: but farre otherwise, made them quake for feare, it stroke them starcke dead to behold it. Yet Crassus selfe shewed greater courage in this misfortune, than he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by euery band he cried out aloude. The griefe and sorrow of this losse (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only: but the noble successe and honor of ROME remaineth still vnuincible, so long as you are yet liuing. Now, if you pitie my losse of so noble and valiant a sonne, my good souldiers, let me intreate you to turne your sorrow into furie: make them deerely buy the ioy, they haue gotten: be reuenged of their cruelties, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why: aspiring mindes sometime must needes susteine losse. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio Antiochus, but their bloud did pay for it. Our auncesters in olde time lost a thousand shippes, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and chiefetaines for the conquest of SICILIA: yet for all the losse of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatnesse it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble and aduersitie, neuer yeelding or giuing place vnto any enimie. Crassus vsing these perswasions to encourage his souldiers for resolution, found that his wordes wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commaunded them to giue the showte of battell, he plainely sawe their heartes were done, for that their showt rose but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other side, their showt was great, and lustely they rang it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the PARTHIANS archers on horsebacke compassing in the ROMAINS vpō the wings, shot an infinite number of arrows at their sides. Their men at armes giuing charge vpon the front of the ROMAINS battel with their great launces, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a fewe excepted, that valiantly, and in desperate maner ranne in among them, as men rather desiring so to die, than to be slaine with their arrows, where they could do the PARTHIANS almost no hurt at all. So were they soone ouercome, with the great launces that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with such a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, saying: they would giue Crassus that nights respit, to lament and bewaile his sonnes death: vnlesse that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his safety to come and offer him selfe to king Arsaces mercy, then to tarie to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMAINS, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The ROMAINES on the other side had a maruellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dresse their wounded men, that died in miserable paine: but euery man bewailed his hard fortune, when they saw not one of them could escape, if they taried til the morning. On the other side, to depart in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Because, to cary them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them so behinde, their painfull cries would giue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now, though they all thought Crassus the only author of their misery, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went a side without light, and layed him downe with his head couered, because he would see no man, shewing thereby the common sort an example of vnstable fortune: and the wise men, a good learning to know the fruites of ill counsel, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to commaund so many thousandes of men, but thought (as a man would say) himselfe the meanest of all other, and one that possest nothing, because he was accounted inferior vnto two persons onely, Pompey and Cæsar. Notwithstanding, Octauius one of his chiefetaines, and Cassius the treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so ouercome with sorrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirite in him: they themselues called the Captaines and Centurions together, and sate in counsell for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarying for them. Thus of their owne authority at the first they made the armie march away without any sound of trumpet or other noyse. But immediately after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting themselues in such sort, that they filled the whole campe with sorrow, and put them out of all order with the great mone and loude lamentation: so as the formost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and set vppon them. Then turning off, and setting themselues in battell ray, one while loading their beasts with the wounded men, an other while vnloding them again, they were left behinde, sauing three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the citie of CARRES. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the walles, and spake in the Latine tongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernour of the towne, that Crassus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and said no more, neither tolde what he was: but rode on still, till he came to the bridge which Crassus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, serued Crassus very well. For Coponius thought by this great hast of his, and the shorte confused speeche he made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight armed his souldiers, and vnderstanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meete him, and brought him & his army into the city of CARRES. The PARTHIANS knew well enough the remouing of the ROMAINS campe, but yet would not follow thē in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, slue all that were left behinde, which were about foure thousand men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many straggling in the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Crassus Lieutenants, who straied in the night out of the army with foure whole ensignes, and hauing lost his way, got a hill, where the PARTHIANS besieged him, slue him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himselfe: yet twenty of them onely escaped, who with their swordes drawne in their hands, running forward with their heads, thrust in among the thickest of the PARTHIANS. They wondering at their desperation, opened of themselues, & suffered them to march onwards to the city of CARRES. In the meane time false newes was brought to Surena, how Crassus with all the chiefest men of his host was fled, & that the great number that were receiued into the city of CARRES were men of all sorts gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie or estimation. Surena thereupon thinking he had lost the honour of his victory, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the troth, that he might either besiege the citie of CARRES, or pursue after Crassus: sent one of his interpreters to the walles of the city, charging him to cal for Crassus, or Cassius, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commaunded. Word was brought to Crassus, and he accepted the parlance. Shortly after also, thither came certaine souldiers of the ARABIANS from the campe of the PARTHIANS, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by sight, hauing diuers times seene them in their campe before the battell. These ARABIANS seeing Cassius vpon the walles, called him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them goe safely, as his maisters good friendes, so that they would surrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of PARTHIANS handes, and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather than to be enforced vnto it by extremity. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassus and Surena should meete to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made answere they would doe it: and so departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at such aduantage, where he might besiege them. The next day he brought all his army before the city of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS maruellously reuiled the ROMAINES, and told them, they must deliuer them Crassus and Cassius bound hands ſecte, if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The ROMAINES were maruellouſly offended that they were thus deceiued, & told Craſſus that it was no boote any longer to looke for aide of the ARMENIANS, but preſently to flie: howbeit to keepe it ſecret in any wiſe from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Craſſus ſelfe had told it to Andromachus, the verieſt traitor and villain in al the city, whom he had choſen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertiſed the enemies in euery point, of their purpoſe and departure. But becauſe the PARTHIANS do neuer vſe to fight in the night, & that it was a hard matter to bring them to it, and againe that Craſſus departed in the night time: Andromachus was afraid leaſt the ROMAINES would win ſuch ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not poſſibly ouertake him the next day. Therefore of purpoſe he ſometime brought them one way, other while an other way, and at the laſt, brought them into a great bogge or mariſh, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they muſt needes make many turnes and returnes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, ſome in the armie began to miſtruſt, that Andromachus ment no good to turne and toſſe them vp and downe in that ſort, and therefore would followe him no more: inſomuch as Caſſius among others, returned towardes the citie of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counſelled him to tary there, til the moone were out of the ſigne of Scorpio, he anſwered them: I feare the ſigne of Sagittarie more. So as ſoone as he could, he tooke his way towardes ASSYRIA with fiue hundred horſemen. And other of the armie alſo hauing faithfull guides, recouered a countrie of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, and retired into a ſafe place before the breake of day: and they were about fiue hundred men, whom Octauius a noble man had in charge. But the day ſtale vpon Craſſus, hunting vp & down yet in the marriſſe, in thoſe ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpoſe brought him, hauing with him foure enſignes of footmen all with targets, and very few horſemen, and fiue ſergeants that caried the axes and roddes before him: with whom, with much a do and great labour, he got into the right way, when the enemies were almoſt vpon him, and that he was within twelue furlong of ioyning with Octauius. There in haſt he had gotten a hil, which was not ſo ſteepe for horſemen, neither of ſuch ſtrength as the other hilles were, called Sinnaca, yet vnder them, and ioyning to them by a long hill that runneth alongſt the plaine, ſo as Octauius plainly ſaw the danger Craſſus was in. Thereupon he firſt ran downe the hilles with a few of his men that followed him: but after alſo came all the reſt, ſaying they were cowards if they ſhould tary behinde. At their comming they gaue ſuch a hot onſet vpon the PARTHIANS, that they made them giue back from that hill: and compaſſing Craſſus in the middeſt of them, couering him rounde with their targets, they ſpake nobly, that neuer arrowe of the PARTHIANS ſhould touche the bodie of their Generall, before they were ſlaine one after an other, and that they had fought it out to the laſt man in his defence. Hereupon Surena perceiuing the PARTHIANS were not ſo couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came vpon them, and that the ROMAINES did once recouer the high mountaines, they could neuer poſſibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Craſſus once more by this deuice. He let certaine priſoners goe of purpoſe, before whom he made his men giue out this ſpeech. That the king of PARTHIA would haue no mortall warre with the ROMAINES: but otherwiſe, he rather deſired their friendſhip, by ſhewing them ſome notable fauour, as vnto Craſſus very courteouſly. And to giue colour to this brute, he called his men from fight, and going himſelfe in perſon towards Craſſus, with the chiefeſt of the nobility of his hoaſt, in peaceable maner, his bow vnbent: he held out his right hand, and called Craſſus to talke with him of peace, and ſaid vnto him. Though the ROMAINES had felt the force & power of their king, it was againſt his will, for he could do no leſſe but defend himſelfe: howbeit that now he was very willing and deſirous to make them taſt of his mercy & clemencie, and was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go ſafely where they would. All the ROMAINES beſides Craſſus were glad of Surenaes words. But Craſſus that had bene deceiued before by their craftie fetches and deuiſes, conſidering alſo no cauſe apparant to make them change thus ſodainly: would not hearken to it, but firſt conſulted with his friends. Howbeit the ſoldiers they cried out on him to goe, and fell at wordes with him, ſaying: that he cared not though they were all slaine, and that himselfe had not the heart only to come downe and talke with the enemies that were vnarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by faire meanes, perswading them to beare a litle patience but till night, which was at hande, and then they might safely depart at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines and straight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint hearted, nor to despaire of their safetie, seeing they were so neere it. But in the ende Crassus perceiuing they fell to mutiny, and beating of their harnes did threaten him if he went not, fearing then they would doe him some villany: went towardes the enemy, and comming backe a litle, said only these wordes: O Octauius, and you Petronius, with all you ROMAINE gentlemen that haue charge in this armie: you all see now how against my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, & can witnes with me, how I am driuen with shame and force

„ Yet I pray you if your fortunes be to escape this danger, that ye will report whereseoeuer you „ come, that Crassus was slaine, not deliuered vp by his own souldiers into the hands of the bar„ barous people, as I am: but deceiued by the fraud and subtilty of his enemies. Octauius would not tary behind on the hill, but went down with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his officers that followed him. The first that came frō the PARTHIANS vnto Crassus were two mongrel GRECIANS, who dismounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to send some of his men before, and Surena would shewe them, that both himselfe and his traine came vnarmed towards him. Crassus thereto made them aunswer, that if he had made any account of his life he would not haue put himselfe into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before, called the ROSCIANS, to knowe what number of men, and to what ende they met so many together. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were stayed: and himselfe in the meane time kept on his way a horse backe, with the noblest men of his army.

Surendes craft to Crassus.

Now when Surena came neere to Crassus: why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? Consull and Lieutenant generall of ROME a foote, and we a horsebacke? Therewithall he straight commaunded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus aunswered Surena again: In that, they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their country, when a meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreed vpon betwene the king Hyrodes, and the ROMAINES: howbeit that they were to go to the riuer, and there to set downe the articles in writing. For you ROMAINES, said he, do not greatly remember the capitulations you haue agreed vpon. With those wordes he gaue him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse, you shall not needs, said Surena, for looke, the king doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a fair saddle richly gilt, vpon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassus immediatly, and followed him behinde, lashed his horse to make him runne the swifter. Octauius seeing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thousand footmen: and after them, all the rest of the ROMAINES also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, & to take him from them by force, that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at an other at the first very grily, and at the last fell to blowes. Then Octauius drew out his sword, and slue one of the barous noble mens horsekeepers: and another came behinde him, and slue Octauius. Octauius slaine.

Crassus had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slue Crassus. Some say notwithstanding, that Pomaxathres slue him not, but an other, yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fell dead to the ground. But all these reports are rather coniecturs, then certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crassus, and other saued themselues by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them and tolde them that Crassus had paide the paine he had deserued: and for the rest, that if they had them come downe with safetie. Then some of them yeelded to their enemies: and other dispersed themselues when night came, and of them very fewe escaped with life. Other that followed and pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sworde. So as it is thought there were slaine in this ouerthrow, about twentie thousand men, and ten thousand taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes, the king his maister, into ARMENIA: and gaue out a brute as farre as the citie of SELEVCIA, that he brought Crassus him-liue, and that he had prepared a ſight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the ROMAINE priſoners there was one called Caius Pacianus, who was very like Craſſus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to anſwere, when any called him Craſſus, or Lord captaine. Him they put a horſeback, and had many trumpets before him, and ſergeantes vpon camels backes, that caried axes before them, and bundles of roddes, and many purſes tyed to the bundles of roddes, and ROMAINES heads newly cut off, tyed to the axes: and after him followed all the ſtrumpets and women minſtrels of SELEVCIA, who went ſinging of ſongs of mockery and deriſion of Craſſus womaniſh cowardlineſſe. Now for theſe open ſhewes, euery one might ſee them: but beſides that ſight, Surena hauing called the Senate of SELEVCIA together, laide before them Ariſtides bookes of ribaldrie, intituled the Mileſians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMAINES fardle or truſſe, called Baſſus. This gaue Surena great cauſe to ſcorne and deſpiſe the behauiour of the ROMAINES, which was ſo farre out of order, that euen in the warres they could not refraine from doing euill, and from the reading of ſuch vile bookes. Then the Senatours of SELEVCIA found that Eſope was a wiſe man, who ſaid, that euery man caried a ſacke on his necke, and that they put other mens faultes at the ſackes mouth, and their owne towardes the bottome of the ſacke. When they conſidered that Surena had put the book of the laſciuiouſnes of the MILESIANS at the ſackes mouth, and a long taile of the PARTHIANS vaine pleaſures and delightes in the bottome of the ſacke, carying ſuch a number of carts loden with naughtie packes in his armie as he did, which ſeemed an army of ermites and fielde miſe. For in the vowarde and foremoſt cockes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely launces, pikes, bowes, and horſe: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, inſtruments of muſicke, daunſing, ſinging, banqueting, and ryoting all night with Curtiſans. I will not deny but Ruſtie deſerued blame: but yet withall, I ſay, that the PARTHIANS were ſhameleſſe to reproue theſe bookes of the vanities of the MILESIANS, conſidering that many of their kings, and of the royal bloud of the Arſacides, were borne of the IONIAN & MILESIAN curtiſans. Things paſſing thus in this ſorte, king Hyrodes had made peace & league with Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who gaue his ſiſter in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes ſonne, and made great feaſts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verſes ſong, Hyrodes ſelfe vnderſtanding well the Greeke tongue, and Artabazes was ſo perfit in it, that he himſelfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and ſtories, whereof ſome are yet extant at this day. The ſame night Craſſus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Iaſon a common plaier of enterludes (borne in the city of TRALLES) came before the kings, and recited a place of the tragedy of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the miſfortune of Agaue, who ſtrake off his ſonnes head. And as euery man tooke great pleaſure to heare him, Sillaces comming into the hall, after his humble duty firſt done to the king, deliuered him Craſſus head before them all. The PARTHIANS ſeeing that, fell a clapping of their handes, and made an outcry of ioy. The gentlemen vſhers by the kings commaundement, did ſet Sillaces at the table. Iaſon caſting off his apparell repreſenting Pentheus perſon, gaue it to an other player to put it on him, & counterfaiting the BACCHANTES poſſeſt with fury, beganne to rehearſe theſe verſes, with a ieſture, tune, and voice, of a man madde, and beſide him ſelfe.

THE COMPARISON OF Craſſus with Nicias.

Nicias and Craſſus richeſſe.

BVt now to proceede to the compariſon: firſt, Nicias goods were more iuſtely gotten, and with leſſe reproach, than Craſſus wealth, for otherwiſe a man cannot giue any great praiſe to minerall works, the which are wrought by lewd and ill diſpoſed barbarous fellows kept in irons, and toiled to death in vnholſome and peſtilent places. But being compared vnto Craſſus buying of confiſcate goods at Sylles handes, and vngentlemanly bargaines of houſes a fire, or in danger thereof: ſurely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting. For as openly did Craſſus auow vſury, as tillage. And again for other faults, wherewith Craſſus many times was burthened, and which he ſtoutly denied: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at ROME, to winne fauor for their ſide: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederats of the ROMAINES, only for his priuate profit: and therefore curried fauor with Ladies, & generally ſought to clo all foule offenders: of all theſe faults, was Nicias neuer ſo much as once ſuſpected. For he the contrarie, was mocked of euery bodie, becauſe for feare he maintained wicked doers gifts: which perhaps would not haue becommed Pericles, nor Ariſtides, and yet was me for Nicias, who was borne a timerous natured man, and neuer had courage in him. Where Lycurgus the Orator did vaunte afterwardes to the people, being accuſed that he redeem detractours with money: I am glad, ſaid he, that hauing dealt thus long in affaires of the ſta it is found I haue rather giuen than taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was though the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and coſt was, in dedicating ſome goodly mage to the goddes, or in making of publicke playes or paſtimes to recreate the people. B all the money he ſpent that way, and all that he was worth beſides, was nothing comparable and but a ſmall parte of that Craſſus beſtowed in an open feaſt he made at ROME: feaſting many thouſands at one time, and did finde and maintaine them alſo for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at thoſe men, that deny vice to be an inequality and diſagreement

of manners, repugnant in it selfe, seing men may honestly spend that which is naughtily got-ten. Thus much for their goodes. For Nicias doings in the common weale, he did nothing maliciously, cruelly, nor vniustly, neither any thing of selfe will or stomacke, but rather dealt plainly and simply. For he was deceiued by trusting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to speake before the people, but with great feare. Crassus on the other side was reproued for his vnconstancie and lightnes, for that he would easily chaunge friendes or enemies: and he himselfe denied not, that he came to be Consull the seconde time by plaine force and crueltie, hauing hired two murtherers to kill Cato & Domitius. And in the assembly the people held for deuiding of the prouinces, many men were hurte, and foure were slaine in the market place: and more then that, Crassus himselfe (which we haue forgotten to write in his life) gaue one Lucius Annalius so sore a blow on the face with his fist, for speaking against him, that he sent him going with blood about his eares. But as Crassus in those things was very fierce and cruell: so Nicias womanish behauior on the other side, and faint heart in matters of the cõmon wealth, humbling himselfe to the meanest and most vile persons, deserueth great reproach. Where Crassus in this respect shewed himselfe assuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of small account, as with Cleon, or Hyperbolus, but would giue no place to Cæsars fame and glory, nor yet to Pompeyes three triumphes, but sought to goe euen with them in power and authority: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeyes power, in the dignity of Censor. For Magistrates, and Gouernors of the common weale, should make themselues to be honored, but not enuied, killing enuie by the greatnes of their power. But if it were so that Nicias preferred quietnes, and the safety of his person aboue all things else, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the forte of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRACIA: he had liberty & scope enough to repose himself in the city of ATHENS, & might haue forborne the dealing in matters, and (as Rhetoricians say) haue put a hoode of quietnes vpon his head very well. For doubtlesse, concerning his desire to make peace, it was a godly minde in him, and an act worthy of a noble person, to bring that to passe he did, appeasing all warre: wherein Crassus certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caspian sea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIAS. But on the other side also, when one hath to deale with people that can discerne when a man ruleth according to equitie and iustice, and that he seeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he must not then for lacke of courage suffer wicked men to steppe in his roome, nor giue occasion to preferre such to authoritie in the common weale, as are vnworthy for that place and countenaunce: neither should alowe such any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor trust, as Nicias did: who was the only occasion that Cleon, being before but a pratling Orator, was chosen Generall. Neither do I also commend Crassus, for that in the warre against Spartacus, he made hast to giue him battell, more rashely then safely or considerately. For his ambition spurred him forward, because he was afrayed least Pompeyes comming should take from him the glory of all that he had done in that warre: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honor of the winning of CORINTHE. But besides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the cõpasse of reason, and can no way be excused. For he did not resigne his honor & office of Generall to Cleon his enemie, when there was hope of good successe, or litle perill: but fearing the daunger of the iorney, he was contented to saue one, and tooke no care besides for the common wealth. Which Themistocles shewed not, in the time of the warre against the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckoning beside his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being chosen generall of ATHENS, least he should haue ouerthrowne the common weale: secretly bribed him with money to leaue off his sute. And Cato also when he sawe the state of ROME in greatest danger, sued to be tribune of the people for the common wealthes sake. And Nicias in contrary maner, reseruing himselfe to make war with the city of MINOA, or with the Ile of CYTHERA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occasion to fight against the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke, and he left the shippes, the armie, and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons rashnes and small experience of warre, when the necessitie of the seruice required the wisest and most expert Captaine. which he did not, despising the meanes to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of need, to defend his countrie. Wherefore, afterwardes he was compelled against his will to be Generall, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: because the people thought he was not so earnest to disswade the iorney, for that he thought it not meete for the common wealth, but because through his sloth and cowardlinesse he would make his countrie lose so good an oportunitie to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great testimony of his honesty and trust they had in him: who though he euer hated warre, and did flie from the offices of honor and charge in the common wealth, his countrimen notwithstanding did alwayes chuse him, as the most experienced person, and meetest man of the citie. Now Crassus in contrarie manner desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroade in the warres) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authority. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his frends that loued him best, thought him (as the comicall Poet sayeth)

A good man any way else, but in warres.

His ambition notwithstanding & couetous desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMAINS. For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the war against his will: but Crassus led the ROMAINS thither against their willes. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the common wealth was brought into miserie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, then to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wise man, and a Captaine of great experiẽce, could neuer so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therfore disswaded his countrimen from the iorney, & would giue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking vpon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS, as though it had bene an easie matter to ouercome them, found himselfe deceiued, yet did he aspyre to great things. For as Iulius Cæsar had conquered and subdued to the Imperiall crowne of ROME, all the countries of the West partes, to say the GAVLES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLAND: euen so did Crassus desire to go towards the East partes, to conquer all to the great west sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the regions of ASIA, where Pompey and Lucullus aspyred, being both very noble personages, and such as euer courteously behaued themselues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For when the charge of the warres in the East parts was assigned to Pompey by decree and order of the people: the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it all they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Cæsar in battell had ouerthrowne and slaine three hundreth thousand GERMAINES, Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this minde, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the hands of his enemies whom he had ouercome, for to be punished: thereby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, vpon him only, that was the vniust breaker of peace. This notwithstãding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feastes and processions fifteene dayes together, and open sacrifices to the gods with great ioy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victory. How gladde may we thinke would they haue bene, and how many dayes would they haue feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SVSE, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and prouinces to the Empire of ROME?

The diuersitie betwixt Nicias and Crassus

If a man will needes do wrong and iniustice,

As Eurypides sayeth to them, that cannot liue in peace, and be contented with their owne: he must not then sticke at trifles, (as raising of a castell of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall countrie, and hiding themselues like birdes without neasts, in another birdes holes) but must decrely sell the wrong he doeth, and not lightly contemne iustice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the great in his voyage, for the conquestes he made in the East, and dispraise Crassus voyage: doe not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euents and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exployts. For he ouerthrew his enemies in diuerſe battels, and had almoſt taken the city of SYRACVSA: and ſure they cannot iuſtely blame him for all the misfortunes that chaunced in the warre of SICILIA, but partly the plague was a cauſe of it, and partly alſo the enuie of thoſe towardes him that remained at ATHENS. Where as Craſſus ranne into ſo many errors, and committed ſuch foule parres in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leaſure to do him good: ſo that I wonder not ſo much that his folly was ouercome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouercome the good fortune of the ROMAINES. Sithens it ſo falleth out thē, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognoſticating before what things ſhould happen by arte and rule of diuination, and Craſſus contrarily diſdaining to obſerue any thing: ſure it falleth out hard in iudgment, which of them two proceeded with moſt ſafety. Yet according to the beſt approued opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excuſable, then of raſhnes and folly to breake any ancient lawe or cuſtome. For their deathes, Craſſus end deſerued leaſt reproach. For he againſt his will did yeeld himſelfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perſwaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraude and treaſon moſt traiterouſly deceiued: where Nicias, cowardly, and diſhonorably hoping to ſaue his life, truſting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

Craſſus by his folly blemiſhed the happines of the Romaines.

Craſſus death more commendable then Nicias end.

THE LIFE OF Sertorius.

PEraduenture it is not to be maruelled at, if in long proces of time (fortune altering her effectes daily) theſe worldly euentes fall often out one like another. For whether it be that the varietie of things are infinite, fortune hath ſtore of matter apt enough to worke to likenes: or be it that worldly matters be cōprehended within determinate number: of neceſſitie one thing muſt fall out like an other, ſince they proceede from one cauſe, tyed to the ſame meanes it before did vſe. But becauſe men doe delight to compare ſuch chaunces together, as they haue ſeene or heard to haue happened ſo like, as if they had bene done of purpoſe, the one by the example of the other: (as that of two men being both named Attis, both of them come of noble houſes, the one in SYRIA, and the other in ARCADIA, both the one and the other were ſlaine with a wilde bore. That of two called Actæon, the one was torne in peeces by his dogs, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipios, the CARTHAGINIANS were first ouercome by the one, and afterwards vtterly destroyed by the other. That the citie of TROYE was first taken by Hercules, for the horses that Laomedon promised him: the second time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great woodden horse: the third time by Chartdemus, by means of a horse that fell within the gate, & kept the TROYANS that they could not shutte it in time. And that of two sweete smelling plantes, Ios, SMYRNA, two cities were named, the one signifying the violet, and the other Mirre: it is supposed that the poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he died in the other) we may adde to this example, that amongst the auncient Captaines, the greatest warriers, and they haue done the noblest exploytes by wit and warlike stratagemes, had but one eye: as Philippus Antigonus, Hanniball and Sertorius also, whom we write of at this present. Whom we may truly repotte to haue bene more chast, than Philippe: more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus: more courteous to his enemies than Hanniball: and for wisdome and iudgment to giue place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though she shewed spight more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men: yet in experience he was quall with Metellus, in prowes and valiancie with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So being banished his country, a stranger in another realme, and hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithstanding maintained wars for a time, against the power of the ROMAINES. Me thinkes therefore, that of all the GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none so well vnto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant & politicke in wars, both were banished men out of their countrie, both were Captaines ouer straungers, and both of them were traiterously and villainously slaine by them, through whom they had before ouercome their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worshipfull parents, & was borne in the citie of NVRSIA in the coūtry of the SAMBINES. His father left him a very childe with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he singularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they say was Rhea. His first rising and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: insomuch as being a young man he came to ROME, and wanne some name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honor and estimation he atchieued afterwardes by his valiant actes, made him imploy all his studie and laborious care, to armes and warres. The first time of his souldierfare was, when the CIMBRES & TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty army: where, whē the ROMAINS had been ouercome vnder the leading of Capio, his horse being slaine vnder him, and himselfe hurt, he notwithstanding swam ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corselet & target vpon him, brake the fury and rage of the riuer with meere strength, so able and lusty a body he had to beare all paines and hardnes. The second time that these barbarous CIMBRES returned with infinite number of fighting men, and with proude and dreadfull threates: the ROMAINES thē so afrayd that they thought him a stout man that had but the courage to keepe his ranke and obey his Captaine. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMAINE armie, and then did Sertorius vndertake to goe and discouer the enemies campe. And for the purpose, apparelled himselfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common wordes and phrases of their language to salute one another when they mette, and in this sorte went among them: and hauing throughly by sight and reporte learned that he sought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him such honorable reward, as was due to his deserte. All the time of the warres after, he did valiant actes and deedes of armes, that his Captaine had him in great estimation, and committed the chiefest matters to his charge. Whereupon the warres being ended with the TEVTONS & CIMBRES, Sertorius was sent into SPAYNE, vnder Didius the Pretor, with charge of a thousand footemen, with whom he wintered in the city of CASTVLO, in the mayne of the CELTIBERIANS: where the souldiers finding plentie of victuals, fell to gluttonie and drunckennes, and committed great insolencie, being ouercome with wine. Insomuch the barbarous people of the city grew to such a misliking and disdaine of them, that they sent by night to their nexte neighbours the GYRISENIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMAINS lodgings, slue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noise, went immediately out of the city with a few of his men, and gathering them together also that fled one ter to saue themselues, went round about the walles of the citie, and finding the gate open where the GYRISÆNIANS came in, there entered he also: who being more carefull than they had shewed themselues, left the gates, and all the parts of the city well garded, and then put all to the sword within that were of age to carrie weapon. Nowe when he had executed this reuenge, he commaunded all his souldiers to leaue off their owne apparell and weapons, and to put on Sertorius stratagem. these of the barbarous people whom they had slaine, and to follow him to the city of the GYRISÆNIANS, from whence they came that had on such a sodaine assailed the in the night. The GYRISÆNIANS seing the garments and weapons of their supposed men farre off, thinking certainly they had bene they: opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their friendes and cittizens, whom they thought had happely sped of their purpose. Thus were a maruellous number of them slaine by the ROMAINES, euen hard at the gates of their citie: and the rest putting themselues to Sertorius mercy, he solde for slaues. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAYNE, and returning to ROME, was made questor or treasuror generall of GAVLE, on this side of the mountaines, by the riuer of Po: Sertorius treasuror Generall of Gaule about the Po. happy chaunce for ROME: for euen at that very present time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had cõmission to prest souldiers, and to make armor. And therein he shewed such diligence and expedition in quicke dispatch of that seruice, in respect of the long delaye and careless regarde other young men had of the same before: that he won the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwardes would atchieue great enterprises. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine himselfe, he would not let to venture his person as valiantly, as any other priuate souldier whatsoeuer, but did maruellous actes with his owne handes, euen in greatest battailes and conflicts: insomuch as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, sayed he, do not alwaies carie the markes about them of their valiant seruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carconets, iauelings, and crownes, giuen them by their Captaines for testimonie of their valiancie: howbeit that he alwaies caried the marks about him (whersoeuer he went) of his seruice, so that such as saw the bleamish of his eye, did therewithall witnes his valiantnes and courage. The people also did honor him as became them. For when he came into the theater, they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praises, which the ROMAINS did scantly vse vnto their oldest Captaines, and which were most honored for their great and noble seruice. Neuertheless, when he sued to be Tribune, he was reiected by Sylla's practise who hindered him: whereupon grew as it seemeth, that grudge & malice which euer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercome by Sylla, and that Sylla was gone out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Consuls, Octauius tooke part with Sylla, and Cinna the other Consul (which sought chaunge and alteration) was gathering men together to set vp Marius faction, that was in manner vnder foote: Sertorius tooke his parte, because he saw that Octauius was but a slow and lither man, and did not besides trust any of Marius friends. So was there a cruell conflict betwene them, euen in the market place within the city selfe, where Octauius had the vpper hand: and Cinna and Sertorius escaped by flying, hauing lost few lesse then ten thousand men in this only ouerthrowe. Nuertheless, afterwardes through practise and policie, they got those souldiers together againe that were dispersed here and there through ITALIE, so as in short time they made their power equall with Octauius force. Marius also being aduertised of the same, tooke the sea incontinently, & returned into ITALIE out of AFRICKE, and came to Cinna to serue as a priuate souldier, vnder his Captaine and Consul. Now they all liked wel, that Marius should be receiued, sauing Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credit and estimation should diminish, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine then himselfe to serue him, or else that Marius cruelty and seuerity (who pardoned none offence) would marre altogether, hauing no stay in his anger, but bent vtterly to all kinde of crueltie to his enemies, if Cinna forced to haue the victory. And thereunto he added this further: that now they had the victory in maner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would rob be them all the honor of ending this warre, and being also in authority, he was neither to be trusted nor commaunded. Whereunto Cinna answered thus: that he thought the wordes he had alleadged to be true, howbeit that he was ashamed, and besides, could not see with honestly how he might refuse Marius, or send him back, sithence he had purposely sent for him, to common parte of the charge of these warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied. Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne goodwill vnsent for, & therfore (as for the best in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduise not to receiue him: but sithence it is so that you sent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counsell whether you should nowe receiue him or not. And therfore you must needes accept his seruice that is come vpon your word: for, the bond of your promise past you, doth now cut off all counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole army into three parties, and then beganne to charge vpon their enemies on all handes, so as they obteined victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible cruelty in this victory, as could possibly be shewed: insomuch as the ROMAINS thought all the miseries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in respect of the great calamities they fell into afterwardes. Now Sertorius on the other side neuer caused man to be slaine for any priuate malice or quarrell he had with any person, neither did he hurte any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marius insolency & cruell murthers: and when he had good oportunity to speake with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perswasion. In fine, Sertorius seeing Marius garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other soldiers in this warre, whom he vsed as executioners of his slaughter and butchery, alwayes attending about his person neas a garde, and suffering them also to make themselues rich, partly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to spoyle, and partely also with that they violently tooke without his commaundement of their own masters, killing them when they had done, rauishing their mistresses, & defiling their children: he could no longer abide such wickednes and villainy, but made them all to be slain in their campe where they lay together being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his sonne (against his counsell, and contrary to the lawes of ROME) had by force made himselfe consull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercome by Sylla) were come out of GAUL to ROME wards, partly through the cowardlines of their captaines, and partely also because they were betrayed and solde of their owne men: and further, considering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those affaires which waxed worse and worse, by meanes of the authoritie of such as had least wit and vnderstanding, and specially also seing Sylla came hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilst vnderhand he wanne his souldiers from him, notwithstanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly despairing of ROMES prosperitie and welfare, departed from ROME to go towards SPAINE, thinking that if he could get the first possession and gouernment of that realme, it would at the least be a refuge and receite for all those of their nation that should chaunce to be banished out of their country. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward he met with fowle and rough weather: and passing through a countrey of mountains, the barbarous people inhabiting the same, demaunded tribute of him, for licence to passe through their territories. Therat the soldiers of his company were maruellously offended, saying that it were too much shame and dishonor for a Proconsull of ROME, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithstãding, Sertorius passed not for the shame they layd it would be to him, but answered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should most reckon of, that aspireth to haughtie enterprises: and so pleased the barbarous people with money. And then he made such speede, as he quickly recouered SPAINE, which he founde greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armor. But now Sertorius perceiued that they had bene hardly dealt withall before, through the insolencie, pride, and couetousnes of the ROMAINE gouernors, whom they ordinarily sent from ROME, and that therfore they hated all manner of gouernment: first of all sought to winne the good willes of all the whole countriemen one and other. and of the common people, by easing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most loue of all men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of soul- diers, and receiuing of any garrison within their cities, compelling his souldiers to set vp their tents, and to make their cabines without the suburbes of great cities to winter there, & caused his owne pauilion to be first set vp, and lay in it himselfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauor: for he armed all the ROMAINE citizens of age to cary weapon that dwelt in SPAINE, and made them make stores of engines for batterie, and a number of gallies besides, so that he had all the cities at commandement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderstoode that Sylla kept ROME, and that the power of the tribe of Marius & Carbo was vtterly ouerthrowen, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a great armie against him: he sent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with sixe thousande men well armed. Immediately after Caius Annius also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to displace Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was driuen to stay at the foote of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune, one Calpburnius surnamed Lanarius, traitorously slew Salinator: whereupon his souldiers foorthwith forsooke the toppe of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had easie passage with his armie which was very great, and drew them that resisted his farther comming on into the country. Sertorius finding him selfe not strong enough to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men vnto the citie of new CARTHAGE, and there tooke sea: from thence he coasted ouer into AFRICKE, and fell with the coast of the MAVRVSIANS, where his souldiers landed immediatly for fresh water, dispersing themselues without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge vpon them, & slew numbers of them: insomuch as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his course towards SPAINE, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuen to take certaine pirates botes of the CILICIANS, and to saile towardes the Ile PITYVSA, where he landed in despight of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither himselfe with a good number of shippes, and fiue thousande fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by sea, though he had but small barkes, purposely made for swift sailing, & of no strength for fight. But now the West winde rising very bigge, did swell the sea in such sort, that it cast the most part of his shippes (being weake and very light) vpon rockes in the sea, and himselfe with a few was kept from land by his enemies; and from the sea by storme was driuen to ride ten daies together at anker, working still for life against the danger of the surging waues & boisterous windes, which continued rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed againe he wayed anker, and ranne into certaine desolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoysing saile from thence, he passed the straight of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hande, landed vpon the coast of SPAINE, lying towardes the great Westerne sea, a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Bætis, the which falling into the sea Atlanticum, gaue name in olde time to that part of SPAINE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine sailers met with him that were newly arriued from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the auncients called, the fortunate Ilands. These two Ilands are not farre one from an other, being but a litle arme of the sea betweene them, and are from the coast of AFRICKE only tenne thousand furlongs. They haue raine there very seldome, howbeit a gentle winde cõmonly that bloweth in a litle moist dew, which moisteth the earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lustie, not onely to bring forth all that is set or sowen vpon it, but of it selfe without mans hand it beareth so good fruit, as sufficiently maintaineth the inhabitants dwelling vpon it, liuing idlely, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleasant continually, and neuer hurteth the body, the climate and seasons of the yeare are so temperate, and the aire neuer extreame: because the windes that blow vpon that land from the other side of the coast opposite to it, as the North & Easter- ly winde comming from the maine, what with their long comming, and then by dispersing themselues into a wonderfull large aire and great sea, their strength is in maner spent and gone before their comming thither. ſe, may peraduenture change their naturall diſpoſitions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrary vnto him, and his good happe changed into ill, grew ſtubbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villanouſly betraied him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICK to the LVSITANIANS offer, who choſe him for their generall, giuing him abſolute power and authoritie: and ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſtraight leauied men of warre, and with them ſubdued the people of SPAINE fronting vppon their marches, of which the more part did willingly ſubmit themſelues, vpon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valiant man beſides in preſent danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuiſes and ſubtilties to winne their good willes: as among others, the pollicie and deuiſe he had of the hynde, which was this. There was a poore man of the countrie called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a hynde in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters: for the dam negoe not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young hynde, and of a ſtrange haire, for ſhe was all milke white. It chaunced ſo, that Sertorius was at that time in thoſe partes, who was alwaies very glad when any man offered him ſuch maner of preſentes: as frutes, foule, or veniſon, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and alſo reward them well for the ſame. So, this poore man preſented Sertorius with his young hynde, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made ſo tame, that ſhe would come to him when he called her, and follow him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily ſight of ſuch a number of armed ſouldiers to-ing as they were, nor yet affraid of the noyſe and tumult of the campe. Inſomuch as Sertorius by litle & litle made it a miracle, making the ſimple barbarous people beleeue that it was a gift that Diana had ſent him, by the which ſhe made him vnderſtande of many and ſundrie things to come: knowing well enough of himſelfe, that the barbarous people were men eaſily abuſed, and quickly caught by any ſubtill ſuperſtition, beſides that by Art alſo he brought them to beleeue it as a thing very true. For when he had any ſecret intelligence giuen him, that the enemies would inuade ſome part of the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his fortes from him by any intelligence or ſodaine attempt: hee ſtraight tolde them that his hynde ſpake to him as he ſlept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himſelfe in ſtrength. In like maner if he had heard any newes that one of his lieutenantes had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, hee would crowne the meſſenger, and bring his hynde abroad with a gatlande and collet of roſegayes: and ſay it was a token of ſome good newes comming towardes him, perſwading them withall to be of good cheare, and ſo did ſacrifice to the goddes, to giue them thankes for the good newes he ſhould heare before it were long. Thus by putting this ſuperſtitiō into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, inſomuch as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a ſtranger wiſer than themſelues, but were ſtedfaſtly perſwaded that they were rather led by ſome certaine god: and ſo much the more, becauſe that his deedes confirmed their opinions, ſeeing his power ſo daily to increaſe, beyonde the hope and expectation of man. For with two thouſand fiue hundred ſouldiers, which he called ROMAINES (although the moſt of them indeed were AFRIKANS, which came ouer with him out of AFRICKE into SPAYNE) & foure thouſand LVSITANIANS, with ſeuen hundred horſemen alſo, he made warre againſt foure great Captaines of ROME, which had the leading of fiue thouſand footemen, two thouſand archers and ſlingmen, with a world of cities and countries beſides. Where Sertorius at the firſt had not aboue twentie at the moſt: and yet with this ſmall power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not only conquere great countries and many goodly cities, but tooke ſome of the Captaines priſoners alſo, whom the Romaines had ſent againſt him. Of which company Cotta was one, whom he ouerthrew in battell by the citie of MELLARIA. He alſo ouercame Didius in battell, being gouernour of SPAINE BÆTICA, by the riuer of Bætis, where he ſlew two thouſand ROMAINES. The treaſurer likewiſe he ouercame Lucius Domitius, Proconſull of the other prouince of SPAINE. And another time he diſcomfited Toranius an other Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he ſlew in fight with all his army. And Metellus ſelfe, being taken at that time for one of the most expert men of warre, and chiefest Captaines among the ROMAINES he put also so oft to distresse, that Lucius Lollius was fain to come out of GAVLE NARBONESIS (now Languedocke) to aide. And they were furthermore driuen to send Pompey the with all speed from ROME with a new army. Because Metellus knew not what course hauing to fight with a most valiant man, & one whom he could neuer either bring to battell, nor yet entrappe in the plaine fielde (so easily could he cast himselfe into all formes) by reason of the dexteritie and swiftnesse of his spanish souldiers being lightly

This place may well be taken two wayes, and either of both allowable: and according to the other it might be said, to leade Romaine citizens to the wars, fighting like valiant men.

Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote to leade an army heauie armed, which could keepe their ranckes, and fighting steadily ouerthrow their enemies with handstrokes, and march vpon their bellies. But to clime mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with these med as light as the winde, and to pursue them in chase that fled still, and neuer kept pla was vnpossible for them to do it, and much lesse to abide hunger and thirst, to liue with kitchin and fire, and likewise to lie on the bare ground without tentes or pauillions, as rius souldiers did. Furthermore Metellus being growen an old man (hauing spent all his in seruice of the warres, and taken and suffred great paines and troubles, giuing himself to quiet and pleasure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his best age, and of body, besides that nature had made him both strong, active, and temperate withall, was neuer giuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and warres, he was likewise acquainted with paines & hardnes from his youth, could away long iorneies, watch many daies and nightes without sleepe, eate litle, and content him with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer so litle leasure, he would continue on horsebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fieldes, which made him very ready expert to know how to winde himselfe out of danger when he was distressed, and cou ly also to compasse in his enemie vpon any aduantage: and besides, to see where he might ter, & where not. For this cause was Metellus driuen (who was still desirous to fight) to the losses & discommodities which they suffer that be vanquished: and Sertorius on the side refusing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue, chase their enemies whom they haue ouercome. For hee cut off his victualles on every tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march forward, Sertorius staied him. And when he lay still in his campe, Sertorius came and him alarums, and draue him to dislodge. If Metellus laide siege to any place, Sertorius besieged him for want of victuals. So that his souldiers were euen weary of altogether. Wh uppon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: oh, well said, cryed all the diers, let Captaine fight against Captaine, and ROMAINE against a ROMAINE. Howbeit tellus refused him, and the souldiers laughed him to scorne. Neuertheless he did but them, and therein shewed himselfe a wise man: for as Theophrastus saith, a Captaine m as a Captaine, not like a priuate souldier. Furthermore, Metellus considering that the OBRITES (who gaue great aide vnto Sertorius in all seruices) were easie to be taken for of water (hauing but one only well in all their city) and that whosoeuer did besiege that should straight be master of all the spring heades of the suburbes about it; hoping there make the citie yeelde vnto him within two dayes at the vtmost: he commaunded his sou to victuall themselues for fiue daies only. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue direction and speedy order to preuent him. For he caused two thousand goates skinnes filled with water, and promised round summes of money for euery skinne brought Many SPANYARDS and MAVRVSIANS straight tooke vpon them the enterprise. Then Sertorius choosing the lustiest men among them, sent them away through the mount commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skinnes with water the citizens, they should cause them foorthwith to put out all their idle people, that the might last them the longer which defended the city. Metellus receiuing aduertisement was much agrieued withall, because his souldiers victuals were well neere spent, which had brought according to his commandement; and therefore he sent Aquinus one of his tenantes, with sixe thousand men to get victuals. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his pur secretly laide an ambush for his returne in a valley full of wodde, and bestowed there three thousande men to set vppon the rereward, whilest he himselfe gaue charge on the vowarde. This made he Aquinus flie, slew the most part of his men, and tooke the rest prisoners. How- Sertorius ouerthrew Aquinus.

tellus campe: who thereupon was driuen with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the SPANYARDS. For these valiant deedes, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honored of all the barbarous people, and specially because he had made them good souldiers, brought them from their former rude and beastly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the RO-MAINES fashion, to keepe their rankes when they fought, to follow their ensigne, & to take the call and word of the battell: insomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly army, well set out and trained, being before a confused multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore, he founde great store of gold and siluer among them, shewing them how they should gilde Sertorius taught the Spanyards the manner of the Romaines.
their headpeeces, set out their shieldes and targettes with fine worke manshippe, and also finely apparell themselues with rich clokes and sleeueless cassockes vppon their armour, causing them to be fine, and furnishing them with money, whereby he maruellously wanne the hartes of the barbarous people. Yet did he farther binde them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children. For he sent generally for all the noble mens young sonnes, through all the cities and prouinces subiect vnto him: and brought them to the goodly citie of OSCA: The citie of Osca.
where he prouided them of schoolemasters to teach them the Greeke and Latine tongue: deliuering their parentes in hande, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they were to be men) meete to be imployed in the seruice of the common weale, albeit in deede it was but a fine deuise of him, to haue them as hostages for their faith and loyaltie towardes him. Then were the fathers of these children glad men to see their sonnes apparelled like RO-MAINES, in faire long gownes garded with purple, to goe ciuilly to the schooles: that *Sertorius payed for their learning: and that oftentimes hee went thither to appose them, to see how they profited: and how he gaue rewardes vnto them that were the best schollers, hanging iewels about their necks, which the ROMAINES call Bulla. Insomuch, that they hauing a custome at that time in SPAINE, that such as were about the Prince or their Chieftaine should die with him when he died, that custome of voluntarie vow to die with their Lorde, being vsed by the barbarous people, deuotion: there were very fewe of their followers and fami- The Spanyards deuotion.
liers that would vow to die with other Captaines, but on the other side, thousandes commonly followed Sertorius, hauing vowed to loose their liues with him. And for proofe hereof is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowen by a certaine citie of SPAYNE, The Spanyards loue to Sertorius.
whose enemies egerly pursuing him: the SPANYARDS not regarding their owne liues to saue his, caried him vp on their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man vpon them, till they put him into the citie, who being safe & out of danger, they then looked by running to saue them selues the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not only beloued of the SPANYARDS, but of o- ther souldiers also that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same fa- Perpenna ioyned with Sertorius.
mily arriued in SPAINE full of mony & with a good number of souldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe against Metellus: his souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius. The which spighted Perpenna to the hart, being proud & stately in the meanes of his wealth and estate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pom- peius was past ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the souldiers armed themselues, and plucked vppe their ensignes that were fast in the ground, and cried out vpon Perpenna to lead them to Sertorius, threatning him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and seeke them a Cap- taine that could both saue himselfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to fol- low their mindes, and to leade the three and fiftie ensignes he had with him, to ioyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius army very great, and specially after all the cities on this side the riuer of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came souldiers to him out of all partes, Ebrus fl.
albeit they were a rash confused multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no reason nor patience to abide time, but cryed out in furie, to set vpon their enemies. This trou- bled Sertorius much, seeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he sawe they fell to mutinie, and would needes haue their wils, and both without reason and all good order would so goe set vpon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them goe as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their follie, but yet tooke such order and direction, as they should not vtterly be cast away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And indeede they had their paiment as he coniectured: notwithstanding he went to rescue them, and so brought them safe into his campe. Now to take away the feare & perplexitie from them, which this ouerthrow perhappes had striken into them; immediately after he caused his whole armie to assemble, as purposing to vse some speech vnto them. At which time he caused two horses to be brought and set in the middest among them, the one an old and feeble iade, and the other a goodly lustie horse, which besides other things, had a meruellous faire thicke taile. Behind the old leane iade, he set a lusty tall fellow: and behinde the goodly horse also, he placed a litle weariſh man, & seeming to sight to haue but small strength. Now vpon a signe giuen them which he had made them priuy to, the strong man tooke the leane horse by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue pluckt it off by the stumpe: and the other weariſh man fell to plucking off haire by haire from the great horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and swet a great while in vaine at the leane horse taile, thinking to haue plucked it off, and in the end did nothing else but make the lookers on laugh: and the weariſh wretch on the other side in a short space (and at ease) had left the great horse taile without neuer a haire on it: Sertorius then rising vp, spake in this sort to his souldiers. Doe ye not (my friendes and companions) said he, how time and perseuerance exceedeth force? and how things vnlikely at the first to be ouercome by force, are yet in time by litle and litle obtained? For continuance ouercommeth all things, and there is no force nor power, but proceeding time consumeth and bringeth to nought, being a most certaine helpe to them that can take opportunitie, and abide time: as in contrariwise haste and rashnes is as dangerous an enemie as may be, to them that doe things of a head without regard. By these common deuises wherewith Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the opportunitie of time. But of all the stratagemes he vsed in warre, that only exceeded all other, which he shewed vnto a people called the CHARACITANIANS. The people do dwell on the other side of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their common abode, but only a great high hill, full of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towards the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great slimie ground and so rotten, that is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crummeth like white lyme, & turneth to mire vnder his feete. And therefore by meanes of the same, when those people were affraide of their enemies, or that they had conueyed the goods they had robbed and stolen from their neighbours into those caues, they thought themselues safe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was impossible to compell them to come out. Now it chaunced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which these barbarous people inhabited, and made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrowen him. But Sertorius being in a rage with them, and because he would shew that he fled not: tooke his horse backe the next morning, and rode as neere to the hill as he could, to viewe the nature and situation of the place: and when he saw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, and walked vp and downe, vainely threatning them to no purpose. Yet going and comming to and fro, he perceiued the winde raised a great dust, of that brittle earth we haue spoken of, and caried it into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof as we said before, lay full vpon the North. This Northen winde which some call Cæcias, is the only winde of all other that keepeth in that quarter, and riseth from the moores and mountaines thereabouts, which are continually couered with snow, and then in the hart of sommer is nourished and increased by the melting of the ice and snow, and so bloweth a iolly coole wind, which refresheth the barbarous people and beastes all the day long. Sertorius marking this with himselfe, and vnderstanding by the inhabitants therabouts, that this winde blew commonly among them: commaunded his souldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light brittle earth together, & to make a mount of it, right against the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockerie of it at the first, thinking Sertorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them vpō it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his souldiers backe again.

A fine deuise of Sertorius to teach men the benefite of time and perseuerance.

Sertorius words to his souldiers, declaring the intent of his deuise.

The Characitanians what people they be.

Sertorius wonderfull deuise against the barbarous people, called the Characitanians his camp. The next morning by breake of day there was a prety litle wind ſturring, that onely blew off the top of his forced mount, and the higheſt part of that maſſe of earth, as chaffe when they winnow corne: and as the ſunne began to haue any power, the North winde alſo roſe, which forthwith filled all the hill with duſt. And withall, came Sertorius ſouldiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thoſe dry clots of clay in peeces. The horſemen on the other ſide, they ſtill mahnaged their horſes vp and downe in it, to raiſe vp the greater duſt, which the winde caried as ſoone as it roſe and blew into the caues of theſe barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and riſes of the rockes. So they hauing no other ventes nor ayre any way, but there where the winde blew in vpon them: it did ſo blindfold their eyes, and filled their caues with ſuch thick ſtuffing ayre, that they were almoſt choked withall, not able to take breath. For when they ſhould draw their breathes, this ſtuffing ayre and duſt came in at their mouthes ſo faſt, that they had much a do to hold out two dayes, and on the third yeelded themſelues vnto Sertorius mercy: the which thing did not ſo much increaſe his power, as it wanne him honor, by policie to haue wonne ſuch an vnlikely conqueſt, which by force could neuer haue bene gotten, and where to fight was matter impoſsible. So long therefore as he made warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, becauſe Metellus was an old man and heauy, and could not reſiſt Sertorius luſty youth, that led a light army, like rather to a company of theeues and robbers, than to an army of men of warre. But afterwardes when Pompey was come ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them being encamped ech before other, and that Pompey had ſhewed him all the ſtratagemes and policies of warre poſsible for a good Captaine to deuiſe, & he the like vnto Pompey: and found that Sertorius had the better of him both in laying his ambuſhes, & alſo in foreſeeing to ſtrappe him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be ſo great, that euen in Rome it ſelfe he was thought to be the nobleſt Captaine, & of beſt conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwardes alſo waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla, who gaue him the ſurname of Pompey the great, for that he had deſerued honour of triumphe, before his beard was growen. So, when he was come thus into Spayne, diuers townes and people ſubiect vnto Sertorius, were halfe in minde to yeeld vnto Pompey: but afterwardes they ſtood ſtaine, vpon the chaunce that happened vnto the citie of Lavron, beyond all expectation. For Sertorius being gone to lay ſiege to it, Pompey in haſt went thither with his army to raiſe the ſiege. Neare vnto the citie there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a camp vpon, and alſo to diſtreſſe them of the city: whereupon the one made haſt to get it, and the other to keepe him from it. Notwithſtanding, Sertorius was the firſt man, and got the hill: and Pompey came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had ſo fallen out, thinking to haue made Sertorius ſure at that time, being kept in on the one ſide with the citie of Lavron, and with his army on the other. Thereupon he ſent vnto the citizens, and bad them care for nothing, but them to ſtand vpon their walles at their pleaſure, to ſee Sertorius ſtraightly beſieged, who thought to haue beſieged them. This meſſage being brought to Sertorius, he ſmiled at it, and ſaid that he would teach Syllaes young ſcholler (for ſo in mockerie he called Pompey) that a good Captaine ſhould rather ſee behind then before him: and therewithall he ſhewed the Romanes ſix thouſand footemen well armed, which he had left in his camp when he came to take the hill where he was, to the end that if Pompey came by chance to aſſaile him, they ſhould giue a charge vpon his rereward. Pompey hauing found this too hote, durſt not aſſaile Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaſſed in behind: and on the other ſide he was aſhamed to forſake the Lavronitans, whom he was driuen in the end to ſee vtterly ſpoyled and deſtroyed before his eyes, and durſt not once ſturre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the contrarie part ſeeing no hope of aide by him, yeelded ſtraight vnto Sertorius, who did not only pardon them, but alſo ſuffered them to go whither they would. Howbeit he burnt the citie for no anger or cruelties (being a Captaine that neuer ſhewed cruelties in anger) but to ſtoppe Pompey withall, and to ſtoppe their mouthes that made ſuch account of him: and that the bruite might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey himſelfe being preſent, and might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly citie of his confederates.

neither durſt nor could helpe them. Indeede Sertorius in continuance of this warre ſuſteined much loſſe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieutenants: for as touching himſelfe, he was neuer ouerthrowen, not thoſe he led. And yet he euer wanne more honor in recouering of thoſe battels which his Captaines loſt, than his enemies did that had put them to the worſe. As in the battell he wanne againſt Pompey, by the city of Svcron, and in an other he wanne againſt Pompey and Metellus both, by the citie of Tvttia. And for the ouerthrow of Svcron, it is thought it came through Pompeyes ambition, making too more haſt for feare Metellus ſhould be partaker of the honour of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him, and therefore fought the battell with Pompey towardes night, ſuppoſing the darkeneſſe of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to ſaue themſelues if they were ouercome, and alſo chaſe the enemies if ſo it happened they had the vpper hand, becauſe they were ſtraungers and knew not the country. When both battels came to giue charge, Sertorius at the firſt met not directly againſt Pompey, but againſt Afranius, who led the left wing of Pompeyes battell, and himſelfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. How beit Sertorius being aduertiſed that the left wing of his owne army againſt the which Pompey fought, was in ſuch diſtreſſe they gaue backe, and could abide no longer, if they were not preſently aided: ſtraight left the leading of the right wing, which he aſsigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all ſpeede poſsible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And firſt he gathered them together againe which had turned their backes, and after put thoſe alſo in good order that were yet a fighting: and ſo hauing encouraged them both with his wordes, and the preſence of his perſon, he gaue a new charge againe vpon Pompey, more couragiouſly than before, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chaſing ſuch as fled) and ſet ſo fiercely vpon him, that he put all the whole army of the Romaines to flight: in ſomuche Pompey himſelfe eſcaped killing in the field very hardly being ſore hurt, & ſaued by a ſtraunge meane. For the Afrikans of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeyes horſe (which was richly trapped with harneſſe of gold & other pretious furniture) falling out among themſelues, and fighting for diuiſion of the ſame: in the meane time let Pompey go, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on the other ſide, whileſt Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battell, made them flye all that ſtood before him, and followed killing of them euen into the trenches of their camp, entring in amongſt them that fled, and ſpoyled the camp being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeyes ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from ſpoile. Sertorius alſo comming thither vpon the inſtant, finding Pompeyes men in diſorder, ſlew a number of them: & the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them into the field, to fight onte more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he ſounded the retreate, and diſloged from the place he encamped, ſaying: had not that woman come, I would haue whipped that young boy to Rome with rods. Now was Sertorius very heauy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynde for by all his ſubtiltie and fineſſe to keepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, at then ſpecially, when they ſtood in neede of moſt comfort. But by good happe, certaine his ſouldiers that had loſt themſelues in the night, met with the hynde in their way, & knowing her by her colour, tooke her, and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of this, diuiſed them a good reward, ſo that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be ſecretely kept. Then within a few dayes after he came abroad among them, and with a pleaſaunt countenaunce told the noble men and the Captaines of theſe barbarous people, how the goddes had reuealed it to him in his ſlepe, that he ſhould ſhortly haue a maruellous good thing happen to him: and with that word ſate downe in his chaire to giue audience. Whereupon they that kept the hynde tooke her from thence, did ſecretely let her go. The hynde being loſe, when ſhe had eſpied Sertorius ſtraight to his chaire with great ioy, and put her head betwixt his legs: and layed her head in his right hand, as ſhe before was wont to do. Sertorius alſo made very much of her, and of purpoſe appeared maruellous glad, ſhewing ſuch tender affection to the hynde, as it ſeemed the water ſtood in his eyes for ioy. Sertorius mocke to Pompey.

the same, at the first were much amazed therewith: but afterwardes when they had better bethought themselues, for ioy they clapped their handes together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull shouts, saying, and stedfastly beleeuing, that he was a heauenly creature, and beloued of the goddes: whereupon they were maruellously pleased in their mindes, and certainely hoped that their affaires should prosper dayly better and better. Another time hauing straighted his enemies with scarcitie of victuals, in the territorie of the SAGVNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they sent great troupes of men to forrage the country, to get victuals. Vpon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either side, where Memmius was slaine, (the valianteſt Captaine Pompey had) courageously fighting in the middest of the battell. Sertorius finding himselfe the stroger, followed his first wing, making great slaughter of those that withstood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus selfe, who taried his comming, defending himselfe more valiantly then was either hoped, or looked for, in a man of his yeares: in somuch as he was at the last hurt with a partisan. Which was such a dishonor to the ROMAINES, not vnto the onely that saw it, but vnto such also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to forsake their Captaine, and turning their shame into anger against their enemies: they couered Metellus round about with their shieldes and targets, and getting him out of the presse and furie of the fight, gaue such a fierce onset, as they drue the SPANYARDS to flie. Thus fortune chaunging the victory, Sertorius to giue his scattered men time to saue themselues, and leasure also for a new supplie (which he caused to be presently leanied) to come at their pleasure: fled of purpose into a citie of the mountaines of strong situation, and there setting a good face of the matter repayred the rampers, and fortified the gates, thinking nothing lesse then to abide there to be besieged, but onely to lay a baite for his enemies, comming to besiege the citie, hoping they should easily winne it, and in the meane time left pursuing of the barbarous people which had thereby good leasure giuen them to saue themselues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppresse the new supplie that was comming to Sertorius, who had sent out his Captaines to the next cities and shyres adioyning, to leanie men, with expresse commaundement, that when they had mustered a conuenient number together, they should send them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderstood of their comming, he easily passed through his enemies to meete them, and with them sodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worse then before: sometime cutting their victuals from them by land, through his ambushes and continuall subtle policies, being quickely in euery place whither they thought to go, with his light army: and on the sea also with certaine pyrats pinneses, with the which he scoured all the coast vpon the sea side. By this meanes, both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to seuer themselues farre one from the other, as much as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, Pompey remained in SPAYNE, (in great scarcitie of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCEIANS, and wrote to the Senate at ROME, that he would returne with his army into ITALIE, if they sent him not money out of hand, for that he had spent all his own dayly fighting for the defence of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME, that Sertorius would be in ITALIE before winter: because he had through his valiancie and great skill brought two of the most famous Captaines of their time, to great extremitie and distresse. Then did Metellus shew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemie. For he proclaimed by sound of trumpet, that if any ROMAINE could kill him, he would giue him an hundred siluer talents, and twentie thousand Iugera of land: and if he were a banished man, he promised he should be restored to his country and goods againe, buying his death by treason, whom he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore, being his chaunce once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was so ioconde and proud for this victorie, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to say, Prince, or soueraine Captaine: and was contented the people should set vp aulters and do sacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlandes of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to dissolute banquets, sitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victory go vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine secret engines carying triumphes of gold, and crownes and garlandes of triumphe, and daunsers of goodly young boyes and fayre girles following of them, with songs of triumphe in his prayse. Wherein doubtlesse he deserued to be laughed at, shewing himselfe so much caried away with ioy and vaine glorie, for one ouerthrow giuen vnto him, whom himselfe was wont to call Sylla fugitiue, & the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On the other side, Sertorius noble courage was easily discerned, first, for that he called the banished mē which were escaped from Rome, and come to him Senatours: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making some of them Treasurers, others Pretors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his country. And in this also, that making warres with the souldiers of the cities of Spayne, and defraying the same at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, so much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with Romaine officers & Captaines: saying still, that he fought for the libertie of the people of Rome, and not to increase the glorie and power of the Spaniards, to the hurt and dishonour of the Romaines. For to say truly of him, he euer loued his country well, & longed much to be sent for home againe: and yet in his greatest troubles, when things thwarted him most, then was his minde greatest, yeelding no manner of shew or appearance to his enemies, of any faint hart or discouragement in him: but againe, when he was in best prosperitie, and had most aduantage of his enemies, he sent vnto Metellus and Pompey both letting them vnderstand that for his part he was contented to lay armes aside, and to liue at home like a priuat man, so that he might be lawfully restored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meanest citizen in Rome, then being a banished man out of his country, to be called Emperour of the world. And it is said that one of the chiefest causes which made him desire so much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpō whom he cast all his loue & delight: in so much as after that his friends in Spayne had sent for him to come to be their Captaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it so strake him to the hart, that he had almost dyed for sorrow. For he lay seuen dayes together continually on the ground weeping, & neuer gaue his souldiers the watch word, nor would be seene of any of his friends vntill that the other noble men and Captaines of his owne estate, came to him to his tent, and were so importunate of him by intreatie and perswasion, that they got him out of his tent to shew himselfe to his souldiers, to speake to them, and to take order for his affaires which prospered very well. By these signes many haue iudged, that he was of a curteous and pitifull nature, and that naturally he was giuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessitie to take charge of men of warre, because he could not otherwise liue quietly nor safely, being pursued by his enemies, which would neuer let him rest, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne gard and safetie. The treatie selfe he made with king Mithridates argued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had ouercome, was reconciled againe (like a wrestler that being ouerthrowen getteth vp on his feete to try an other fall with his enemy) and tooke vpon him to inuade Asia: Sertorius fame was then so great, that he was spoken of through the world, by marchaunts comming from the West, who blew about the report thereof all the East parts ouer, euen into the realme of Pont, like to marchandise which the went to seeke for in strange countryes. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded by the vaine vaunts of his fauoured courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hannibal, and himselfe vnto king Pyrrus, saying that the Romaines being set vpō by thē both, could not withstand two such excellent natures, and great powers together, when the noblest Captaine of the world should be ioyned with the greatest and most puissant Prince that euer was: sent then vpon his Ambassadours into Spayne vnto Sertorius, with full power and commissiō to promise him money and shippes towardes the maintenaunce and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he desired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the possession of Asia again, the which he had surrendred vp vnto the Romaines vpon the peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his councell together (which he termed the Senate) to consult vpō this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mithridates offer, and were exceedingly glad of the same, considering that they asked them nothing but a fayre in the ayre, and a name of things which were not in their power, offring them therefore things present, ordent, whereof they had greater needs, yet would Sertorius neuer agree thereunto. Notwithstanding thus much he granted Mithridates, that he should enioy CAPPADOCIA & BITHYNIA, which had euer beene countryes subiect vnto kings, and whereunto the ROMAINES had neuer any right, excepting this specially: that he would neuer suffer him to vsurpe any countrey, nor the which the ROMAINES had any iuste title, & the which he had lost in warres by force of armes vnto Cimbria, and had afterwardes also willingly surrendred by agreement made betwixt him and Sylla. For he said he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his victories, but not impayre or hurt it by his conquestes. For, a valiant man (sayd he) should court to conquer with honour, but in no wise desire life with dishonour. His answere being reported vnto Mithridates, did much amaze him: & some haue written, that he then sayd vnto his familiers: What would Sertorius commaund vs then, if he sate among them in the Senate at Rome, who being an exile now, & remaining in the farthest part of the world by the sea Atlanticum, doth take vpon him to bound the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs also with warres, if we attempt any thing against SPAIN? All this notwithstanding, they were agreed vpon othes betweene them, that Mithridates should enioy the countryes of CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius should send him one of his Captaines with aide of warre, and that vpon performance thereof, the king should giue him the summe of three thousand talents, and fortie shippes of warre. So Sertorius sent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of ROME, who fled to him for succour: with whom Mithridates distressed certaine cities of ASIA. And when Marius entred into them, with his sergeauntes carying the bundles of roddes and axes before him, as before a Proconsull of ROME: Mithridates gaue him the vpper hand, as his better and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did set certaine cities at libertie, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodnesse did release them of their taxe and custome they payed for that poore ASIA which had been oppressed by the couetousnesse of the Gouernours and farmers of the ROMAINES, and also by the pride & insolencie of the souldiers which lay in garison among them, began to haue some hope of chaunge, and to desire the alteration of gouernment, which Sertorius offered. But on the other side, the Senators of ROME that were in SPAYNE as banished men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and estate that himselfe was of, they hearing say that all was well again at Rome, and perswading themselues that they should be strong enough for their enemies, hauing no cause to feare any more danger: began then to enuie Sertorius greatnesse and authoritie, but Perpenna specially among other, who by reason of his nobilitie being puft vp with a vaine presumption and ambitious selfe will, practised to make himselfe chiefe of all the armie, and to that end threw forth amongst his friendes and familiars such kinde of seditious wordes. What euil fortune (quoth he) my friendes doth dayly haunt vs worse then other, making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commaunding at this day both land and sea at his will) to choose rather to forsake our landes and country? And now being come hither in hope to liue at libertie, we willingly make our selues slaues, becomming Sertorius garde for defence of his person in his exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with fayne wordes, calling vs the Senate, whereat euerie man laugheth to heare vs so called, and in fine we must abide this dishonour to be at his commaundement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the SPANYARDES and LVSITANIANS do themselues. Herevpon the more part of them being carried away with these mutinous wordes, durst not yet shew themselues in actuall rebellion against Sertorius, being afraid of his authoritie: howbeit secretly vnderhand they ouerthrew his doings, by shewing extreme crueltie vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iustice, imposing great payments vpon them, giuing it out it was Sertorius commaundement. By which lewd practises, many cities reuolted against him, and put themselues into his enemies hands: and they dayly also raised new mutinies and rebellions vpon him. Furthermore, those whom he sent to pacifie the tumultes did handle themselues in such sort, that where they should haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they set them farther out, and procured new tumultes. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodnesse so altered, that he committed almost cruell act vpon all the noble mens children of that land, which

THE LIFE OF Eumenes.

Eumenes parentage.

VVris the Historiographer writeth, that Eumenes was borne in the city of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a cariers sonne of the same country, (who for pouerty earned his liuing by carying marchandises too and fro) and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought vp, aswell at schoole, as at other comely exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Phillip king of MACEDON chancing to come throgh the city of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to do, he tooke great pleasure to see the yong men of the citie handle their weapons, and boyes to wrestle: and among them, Eumenes shewed such activitie, & performed it with so good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But sure their report seemeth truest, which write that Philip did aduance him for the loue he bare to his father, in whose house he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his seruice with king Alexander his sonne, where he was thought as wise a man, and as faithfull to his maister, as any: and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe secretary, yet the king did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefest friends & familiars. For he was sent his Lieutenant generall of his whole army, against the INDIANS, and was Perdiccas successor in the gouernement of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephestions charge after his death. Nowe because Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the body vnto the king) after the death of Alexander tolde the Lords of the counsell of MACEDON, that he had serued the king with his shield and speare, and how Eumenes had followed with his pen and paper: the Lordes laughed him to scorne, knowing that besides many great honors Eumenes had receiued, the king esteemed so well of him, that he did him the honor by mariage to make him his kinsman. For the first Lady that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barsine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a sonne, & called his name [illegible] les: & of two of her sisters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomye, & her sister also called Barsine, he bestowed vpon Eumenes, when he distributed the P[illegible] among his Lords and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fell disgrace with king Alexander, and stood in some danger by means of Hephestion. For stion following Alexanders comme on a time, hauing appointed Eunus a phiphe, player ging, which Eumenes seruants had taken vp for their maister: Eumenes being in a rage, with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a man were better be a phiphe & a com-plaier of Tragedies, then a souldier, sithence such kinde of people were preferred before of seruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that present time was as angry as Eumenes, & roundly tooke vp Hephestion for it: howbeit immediatly after hauing cha his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, because he thought him not to haue vsed francke speech so much against Hephestion, as of a certaine presumptuous boldnesse to himselfe. And at an other time also, when Alexander was sending Nearchus with his army sea to cleere the coasts of the Ocean, it chanced the king was without money: where he sent to all his friends to take vp money in prest, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of w he requested three hundred talents. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and said he had a doo to get him so much of all his tenants. Alexander said nothing to him, neither wo he suffer them to take his hundred talents: but commaunded his officers to set Eumenes afire, because he would take him tardy with a lie, before he could giue order to carry awa goods and siluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make to take any things the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was sorie it was burnt cause all his letters and writings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenc they found in niggots of gold and siluer mingled together, about a thousand talents, and Alexander tooke none of it away: but more then that, he sent vnto all his Lieuten Captaines, and Gouernors of countries, where soeuer they were, that they should send h copies of all the letters which they before had sent vnto him, because all those which he were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hep stion fell at variance againe, by reason of a gifte that was giuen him, insomuch as very words passed betwixt Hephestion and him: yet did not the king giue Eumenes any ill coun nance at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hephestion was dead, the king takin death greeuously whom he loued so dearely, gaue no good countenance (and was very besides) vnto those whom he knew bare any grudge to Hephestion whiles he liued, & th thought were glad of his death, but specially vnto Eumenes of all other, whose malice to Hephestion was knowne to him well enough: insomuch as he would oft twit him withall membring him of the iniuries he had offred Hephestion. But Eumenes being very wise, and that could take his time, procured his helpe by the selfe same meane that did him hurt deuised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honor Hephestions funerall with all po possible) new inuentions to set forth the same, of more magnificence then had before b Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the MACEDONI footmen, and the noble men that had bene neerest about him: and in that quarrell, Eume in good will stucke to the Lords, but in words he seemed a newter and friend to both pa saying, it was not for him being a stranger, to thrust himselfe into the quarrels of the MA DONIANS. And when the other Lordes were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarry behinde pacified the greatest part of the souldiers, and made them more tractable and re to agree with the Lordes. Whereupon, after the Lordes and Captaines had consulted to ther, and taken order for those contentions, they deuided the gouernement of the prouin among them which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coast vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the city of TRAPEZVNTA which at that time was not subiect to the empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then king. Howbeit it was said, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in possession of it, wi none account of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, despising all other. And Leonatus also came downe into PHRYGIA, and vndertooke the iorney of his conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in iorney thitherwards, Hecataeus tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, & praied him rather to go helpe Antipater & the other MACEDONIANS, which were besieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus, being willing to take sea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecataeus: for they were not friends one with another, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecataeus, about the gouernment of their citie. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto king Alexander, saying that he was a tyrant, and besought the king that it would please him to set the CARDIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refusing that iourney against the GRECIANS, alleaging that he was afraide of Antipater, who had bene his enemy of long time, doubting that for the olde grudge he bare him, & also to gratifie Hecataeus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed himselfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would passe ouer the sea to aide Antipater, where in deed his meaning was to take the kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him letters sent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come into the citie of PELLA, and there she would mary him. When Eumenes was made priuy to his purpose: either because he feared Antipater, or els for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fonde man, and very rashe and vnconstant in his doings, he stale away from him by night, with those few men he had (being about three hundred horsemen, and two hundred footmen well armed) taking all his golde with him, which amounted to the summe of fiue thousand talents, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereupon he was immediatly of great credit about him, and called to counsell. Shortly after, Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he himselfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken prisoner, and Eumenes established Gouernour of the countrie, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his friends, and left them there Captaines of garrisons which he appointed, placing euery where, Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernours, and all such other officers necessarie as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas himselfe, as well to waite vpon him, as also because he would euer be about the kings. But Perdiccas thinking with himself that he alone could wel enough performe the enterprise he went about, and considering also that the realme he left behinde him stood needfull of a wise and faithfull Gouernor, whom he might trust with the safety of his state: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes back againe, vnder colour to send him to his gouernment, but in deed to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined vpon the frontiers of his countrie whereof he was Gouernor, because Neoptolemus did vnder hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proude and insolent person, yet Eumenes still deuised to hold him in, and kept him from attempts, by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiuing also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footmen were growne exceeding stout & insolent: he for a strength & defence against them, set vp a company of horsemen, and to bring to passe, released all the countrymen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to serue a horseback, and bought a great number of horse of seruice, which he gaue among them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them coragious, by honours and gifts he gaue to them that serued well, and so by continuall exercise and often remouing them from place to place, made them very ready and seruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, some much amazed, some others very glad when they sawe how by his diligence Eumenes had in so short a time gotten about him such a number, as six thousand and fiue hundred horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing subdued the GREEKES, came on with their army into ASIA to ouerthrowe Perdiccas greatnesse and power: and newes also, that shortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Wheruppon Perdiccas being otherwise occupied in warres, fighting against Ptolomey, made Eumenes his Lieutenant generall, and gaue him commission and full authoritie ouer all his souldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the same that they should be obedient vnto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Nowe for Alcetas he flatly answered, that he would not be at this warre: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were ashamed to take armes against Antipater, and moreouer they would not fight against Craterus, but contrary were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, so much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other side, was as ready to play the traitor, and to do Eumenes a shrewde turne, as Alcetas was. For being sent for by Eumenes to come to him, where he should haue obeyed him, he set his men in battell ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the first fruite of his wise foresight of the horsemen, which he had set vp to make head against the footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footmen were broken and ouerthrowne, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horsmen, and tooke all his cariage. Then he made the march in order of battell against the MACEDONIANS, who were dispersed euery where following the chase of his footmen, whom they had ouerthrowne. Thus coming vpon them in this disorder, he draue them to throwe away their weapons, and to yeelde vnto him: moreouer, euery man to take his othe to serue him faithfully in this warre, whersoeuer he would lead them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who sent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he should not only enioy the countries and prouinces still which he had in gouernment, but furthermore that they would giue him others vnto them, and make him stronger then euer he was: besides that by the acceptation of the offer, he should be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made answere that hauing alwaies bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a sodaine become his friend, especially seeing him vse his friends as enemies: howbeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to restore him againe to his fauour, vpon reasonable & indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he ment to assaile him, that then he would aide him so long as he had any breath in his bodie, and would lose his life before he would breake his promise. This answer being brought vnto Antipater, they fell to consult at length what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled vpon his ouerthrowe, was come vnto them: who tolde them how the battell was fought, and besought them both (but instantly, but Craterus chiefly) to giue him aide if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were so fatte in loue with him, that if they did but see his hatte, and heare him speake, they would all arme themselues and follow him. For, to speake a troth, Craterus was had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS: insomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more desired of the common souldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their sakes incurred Alexanders disgrace and displeasure, because he went about to perswade him to leaue the king of PERSIAES maner, whereunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue himselfe: and also for that he maintained & defended the customes of the country of MACEDONIA, the which euery man through pride and excesse began to forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus sent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himselfe with Neoptolemus, against Eumenes with the best part of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vnprouided, supposing he would giue himselfe to pleasure and pastime, after so late a victorie. But Eumenes like a wise and vigilant Captaine had taken such order, that he heard newes enough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readinesse to meete him. Yet was not this the chiefest point of his skill in warre. For he looked so precisely vpon their doings, that he did not onely keepe his enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men also to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew against whom they should fight, & to keepe also so dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge: that of all others he shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policie. First, he made a rumor to be spred in his hoast, how Neoptolemus & Pigres were againe come against him, with certaine horsemen of all sortes gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great deale of sleepe came vpon him, in the which he had a maruellous strange dreame. For it seemed vnto him that he saw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with an other, either of them leading battell of footmen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN fashion: who comming to giue charge the one vpon the other, came the goddesse Minerua to aide the one, and Ceres likewise to aide the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowne, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to giue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perswaded himselfe that this dreame made for him, and promised him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile countrie of corne, where was great plenty of it. For all the fields were sowne with corne in euery place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefit of long peace, to see all the corne fieldes how greene they looked. But when he vnderstood that the enemies had giuen their souldiers for the signall of battell, Minerua and Alexander: then was his first imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for signall of the battell to his souldiers, and commaunded euery man to make them a garland of wheate eares to weare on their heads, and that they should wreath flowers and nosegayes about their pikes. He was in minde many times to make his trustiest Captaines priuie against whome they should fight, but not alone to trust himselfe withall, to keepe so necessary a thing as that secret: yet in fine, he kept his first resolution, thinking it the safest way, not to commit this danger, but to himselfe. Now when he came to giue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly against Craterus, but set two companies of men of armes that were strangers against him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus sonne) and Phœnix Tenidian did lead. Then he specially commanded, that so soone as they sawe the enemies before them, they should straight giue charge, giuing them no leasure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Herauld or trumpet that they should send vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himselfe, he led the right wing of the battell, with a troope of three hundred men at armes, the chiefest men of all his armie, where he should meete full with Neoptolemus fronte. When they had passed a litle hill that stood betweene both battels, Eumenes horsemen following his commandement, ranne with full cariere to set vpon their enemies. Craterus seeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and cursed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that sorte, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his side, if they might but once see him: notwithstanding, he praied them that were about him, to shew themselues like valiant men that day, and therewithall straightly set spurres to his horse to meete with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their staues being broken, they fell straight to their swords: but that day did not Craterus dishonor the memory of Alexander, for he slue many of his enemies round about him, valiantly repulsed them that did assaile him, and many times ouerthrew them. Yet in fine one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him such a blowe on the side, that he turned him ouer his horse, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Gorgyas, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to guarde him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the very pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other side, which had bene mortall enemies of long time, began fire with an old malice, they sought vp & downe the one for the other. So at the two first encounters they could not one light vpon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they set spurres to their horses, their swords drawne, and with great cries gaue charge vpon each other. And their horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed gallies had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their horse necks, closed together, and with both hands striued to plucke off each others headpeece, and to rent their polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing each other, their horses ranne from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrestled together. Neoptolemus got vp first: but as he rose, Eumenes cut the hamme of his legge, and raised himselfe vp withall. Neoptolemus staying himselfe vpon one knee, his other legge being very sore hurt, defended himselfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could giue him no deadly wound: neuertheless himselfe had a blow on the necke, that laide him flat on the grounde. Then Eumenes inflamed with choller against him, went about to strippe him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious moode, remem-bred not that Neoptolemus had his ſword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groine, not farre from his priuie partes: howbeit the wounde made Eumenes worſe afraide, then there was cauſe of hurt, for that Neoptolemus ſtrength was gone before the ſtroke came, dying preſently vpon it. Eumenes hauing ſtripped him found himſelfe very ill, (by reaſon of his wounds) on his armes and legs, which had many a ſore gaſhe: notwithſtanding, he got vp on his horſe againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had bene fighting ſtill. But there being tolde that Craterus had his deaths wound, he went ſtraight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not paſt knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horſe, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accurſed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pittifull ſtate, and had alſo forced him to be in battell againſt one of his deereſt friends, to make him the inſtrument of his vtter vndoing. This ſecond battell Eumenes wanne ten dayes after the firſt battell obtained, which got him great honour, for that he had diſcomfited one of his enemies through wiſedome, and the other by valiantneſſe. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his friends alſo that tooke his parte, when they bethought them, that he being a ſtranger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS themſelues, ſlaine the greateſt and moſt famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had bene ſo happie, as to haue liued and receiued the aduertiſement of Craterus death: no doubt he had bin the greateſt perſon of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill luck would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was ſlaine in a mutinie of his men in EGYPT, newes came to his army of Eumenes victorie, and alſo of the death of Craterus. Whervpon the MACEDONIANS were ſo offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, & gaue Antigonus and Antipater commiſſion to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes paſſing by mount Ida (where the king kept a race and breed of horſes) had take away with him as many horſes as he would, and had ſent letters of aduertiſement thereof to the kings riders: Antipater, as it is reported, ſmiled, and in mockerie ſaid, that he maruelled to ſee Eumenes great care, to thinke that he ſhould either giue or receiue any account of the kings goods. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of LYDIA, eſpecially neere vnto the chiefe citie of SARDIS, becauſe he was the ſtronger in horſemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra ſee the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high PHRYGIA, and wintered in the citie of CELÆNES. But there Polemon, Alcetas, and Dotimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the army, ſaying, that they had as much right to leade the armie as he. Eumenes anſwered them, truly here is euen the common ſaying vp and downe: deſperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes hauing promiſed his ſoldiers pay within three daies, to keep his promiſe ſold them all the farmes and caſtels of that country, together with the men and beaſts of the ſame, whereof the prouince was fully repleniſhed. Thereupon his Lieutenants of the bands hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of battrie which he ſuffered them to cary with him: and hauing taken them, they went and deuided the ſpoile, paying euery ſouldier ratably his wages due. This deuiſe brought him againe into fauour among his ſouldiers. For certaine papers being found in his campe caſt abroade by his enemies, promiſing great offices, and a hundred talents beſides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that ſerued vnder him were ſo offended withall, that they preſently ſet downe an order, that from that time forward a thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers among them (which alſo had charge vnder them) ſhould alwaies garde his perſon, keeping watche euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Whereunto they all agreed: and Eumenes gaue them thoſe honors and rewards, which the kings of MACEDON were wont to giue vnto their friends, and which they gladly receiued. For through their graunt he had authoritie to giue purple clokes and hats to whome he thought good, which was the honourableſt gift the king of MACEDON could giue. It is true that proſperitie maketh ſimple men high minded, whereby they ſeeme (though they be not) very honorable, but ſpecially when fortune hath raiſed them to honor & wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble minde and ſtout courage is beſt diſcerned in aduerſitie: for he neuer yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. CIA, through the treason of one of his souldiers: he being pursued, yet neuer gaue the traitour any leysure to flie to his enemies for safety, but tooke him and trussed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horse head vpon a sodaine, and leauing his enemies side hand of him that had him in chase, he closely stale by them without their knowledge, and held on iorneying so long, vntill he came to the selfe same plaine, where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies, (the Captaines by them selues, and the souldiers apart) he burnt them with the doores, gates, & windowes of all the villages and townes thereabouts that he could get together: and in stead of tombes for them, he raised vp great heapes of earth. Insomuch as Antigonus comming thither immediatly after, he wondred much at his valiantnesse and inuincible courage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, and easily without danger haue taken a number of prisoners, as well free as bond, and haue gotten all the riches and treasure which they had spoiled in so many sundry wars, townes, and countries: howbeit he was afraied that if his souldiers were loden with that spoile, it would make them more heauy to march, and vnable to flie, but specially more tender to abide to run from place to place a long time together, being the only meane wherein he trusted to come to end this war. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary in following him so long a time, and therfore that he would turne some other way. Moreouer he perceiued that it was vnpossible for him by his authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking so rich a prey, as offered it selfe vnto them: whereupon he commanded them to stay a while, and bate their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he secretly sent a messenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all speede out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not far from thence, and safe from horsmen, where they could not be enuironned, and there to fortifie him selfe: sending him word also, that he sent him this aduertisement, for the old friendship and acquaintaunce that had bene betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men trusse vp their cariage straight. Thereupon Eumenes openly sent certaine light armed men to discouer, and to bring him news: and therwithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their horses, as if he had ment to haue led them against the enemies. His skouts were now returned, and told him that it was vnpossible either to distresse or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of such strength, & therefore he was not to be come by. Eumenes seemed to be very sory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithstanding. Menander after wardes reported this matter to Antigonus, & the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, & after that loued him better then euer they did before: because that hauing their childrē in his hands whom he might haue made slaues, and their wiues also whom he might haue defiled, he spared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humor, told them, ye are deceiued, my friends: for it was not for your sakes, nor yet to pleasure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, and your goods, but only for the feare he had to haue shackles on his heeles, to let him from speedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled stil before Antigonus, & wandring vp & down, did him selfe wish his souldiers to get them somewhere else: either in deed for that he was careful of them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue such a number about him, being too few to fight a battel, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strong place of situation called Nora, in the confines of LYCAONIA and CAPPADOCIA, with fiue hundred horsmen, and two hūdred footmē well armed. And when he was come thither also, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that asked him licence, because they could not haue abiddē the discommodity of the place, which was very straight, and the lacke of necessary victuals which they must needs haue wanted, if the siege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good wordes and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the fort, but would not besiege it before he sent for Eumenes to come to him vpon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the heades of his tribe, and that him selfe on the other side had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therfore if Antigonus would haue him come and speake with him, that he should send him one of his chiefest frends in hostage. Againe, Antigonus being earnest with him, & telling him it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: Eumenes aunswered him, I will acknowledge none better then my selfe, so long as I can hold my sword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes request) sent his owne nephew Ptolomy into the fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and saluted each other, as friendes of old acquaintance and familiarity: and so fell in talke of diuers matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made request to depart in safety, neither demaunded pardon, but only desired the confirmation of his charge and gouernment, and that he might be restored to that which was giuen him. They that were present at their meeting maruelled much at Eumenes, & greatly commended his stoutnes. Now whilest they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all partes of the campe, to see what manner of man Eumenes was: because that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN souldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Nuertheless, Antigonus fearing they would doe Eumenes some mischiefe, commaunded them aloude to giue backe, and threw stones to be throwen among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithstanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much a doe to deliuer him safely into his fort againe. After this parlance, Antigonus compassed this fort of Nora round about with a wall, and left a sufficient number of men to continue the siege, and so went his way with the rest of his army. In the meane time Eumenes remained besieged within this fort, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and salt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor sweete of taste, to sustain them with their bread. Yet with all as he had, he kept them in good liking that were in house with him. For he made them eate one after an other sit at his bourd with him, and withall did fashion out that manner of life with a certaine life and familiarity of pleasaunt deuises to entertaine them at their meate. Besides that he sought to shew them as pleasaunt a countenaunce as he could, yet naturally he had a sweete faire face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had been trained vp in it: but like a fresh youth, being of such a constitution of body, that the exactest workeman that euer was could not better set out all the partes and proportion of a man then were naturally to be seene in him. His speach was not harsh nor churlish, but very mild and pleasant, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the siege, there was nothing more annoyed the besieged, then the narrownesse of the fort wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlongs compasse about, and their houses so litle and narrow, that they could scant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of exercise for themselues, or their horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishnesse that groweth by idlenesse (a thing most hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines) to keepe their breath, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occasion were offred: put his men into the greatest and widest hall he had in his house, (being fourteene cubites long to wake vp and downe in) and taught them first of all to march fair and softly, and then by litle and litle to hasten their pace. For the horses he had, them he made to be girt before, one after an other, and then softly trise them vp with long pulleyes fastned to the beames: their hindmost feete standing on the ground, and their formost being aloft. The horses being trised vp in this maner, their keepers came with loude cries behind them, and some with whippes in their handes to lash them: and the horse being mad withall, yerked out behinde, and sprang forward with his formost feete not to touch the ground, that they did but euen rase it a litle, so as euery vaine and sinew of them were strained by this meanes, that they blue, and were all of a fome withall, so good an exercise to them it was, as well to put them in breath, as to keepe their legges supple to run. Besides that, they had their oats very cleane pickt and dressed, that they might digest them the sooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this siege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, and that the realme was in a great broile, through the factions of Cassander & Iyperchon. Antigonus, whose head was straight ful of great imaginatiõs, greedily coueting to make him selfe the whole kingdome of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his friend, that through his helpe he might attaine his desired purpose. Thereupon he sent Hyeronymus vnto him to treate of peace, and gaue him the forme of the othe which he would haue him sweare vnto him. When Eumenes had seene it, he would not be sworne in that maner, but corrected ſayed: that he did refer himſelfe to the iudgment of the MACEDONIANS which kept him beſieged, to iudge which of thoſe two formes was moſt meeteſt: that which Antigonus had ſent him, or the ſame which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of oth, there was a like mention onely made at the beginning of the blood royall, but in all the reſt following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himſelfe. But Eumenes in his forme of oth, did firſt of all put Olympias the mother of king Alexander, and the kings his ſonnes afterwardes: and for the reſt, he ſware he would be friend of the friendes, and enemie of the enemies not of Antigonus onely, but of the kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the ſiege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes oth, than they did that of Antigonus. So hauing giuen Eumenes his oth, & made him ſweare according to that forme: they raiſed their ſiege, and ſent alſo vnto Antigonus to take his oth. All this accompliſhed, Eumenes redeliuered the CAPPADOCIANS their hoſtages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their ſteade, horſe of warre, beaſtes of cariage, tentes and pauilions. Thus he beganne to gather his men againe togither, which were diſperſed abroade after his ouerthrowe, ſo that in few dayes he was aboue a thouſand horſmen, with whom he fledde, hauing yet Antigonus, and he did wiſely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to hunte him vp againe ſtraighter then he was before: but beſides that wrote ſharpe letters and very angrily vnto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the oth. Whileſt Eumenes wandred vp & downe flying ſtill, he receiued letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatneſſe) and ſpecially from Olympias: which ſent vnto him to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young ſonne Alexander, whom they ſought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewiſe receiued letters from Polyperchon and from king Philippe, who commanded him to make war with Antigonus with his armie he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purſe of the kings fiue hundreth ſiluer talentes (which had bene taken from him before) which were in the citie of CYNDES, and beſides, to defraye the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meete. And therewithall they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraſpides: to make the ſouldiers with the ſiluer ſhieldes, or ſhieldes ſiluered, which were of the olde bandes of Alexanders armie. Theſe two Captaines hauing receiued theſe letters, did vſe Eumenes with very good wordes, and ſhewed him great countenance: yet a man by their lookes might eaſily coniecture that they enuied him, for either of them both thought themſelues men ſufficient, and worthy to commaunde, Eumenes, not to aide him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued himſelfe very wiſely. For as touching their enuie, he pacified that, becauſe he tooke not the money which he was cõmaunded to take for his owne vſe, for that he had no need of it. And for their ambition and preſumption, diſdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell howe to commaunde nor obey; he did reclaime them, by a ſuperſtition he vſed before them, which was this. He made them beleeue that Alexander did appeare to him in his ſleepe, and that he ſhewed him a pauilion ſumptuouſly ſette out in the ſtate and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and tolde him, that if they would keepe their councell place in that pauilion, he would be preſent among them, and ayde them in all their councels and conductes of their warres, ſo that they would alwaies begin by him. He eaſily perſwaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleue that which he ſpake, who would not goe to him to conſult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for himſelfe to be ſeene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their conſents they incontinently ſet vp a goodly rich pauilion, which was called Alexanders pauilion: and there they kept their coũſels and aſſemblies for diſpatch of all their weightieſt cauſes. After this, they went towardes the countries and met with Peuceſtas on the way, (Eumenes very great frend) who ioyned with them, and other great peeres of the realme, with all their power beſides. This did greatly augment the armie of the noblemen of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne perſons, becauſe they had no man to commaund them ſince the death of Alexander, they were growen ſelfe willed by diſſolute libertie, and effeminate in their manner of life: and moreouer they had gotten a tirannicall fierceneſſe, nouriſhed & increaſed by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with an other, but shamefully flatered the olde bands of the MACEDONIAN souldiers, giuing them money, and making them banquets and feastes of sacrifices. And thus in short time, of a campe they brought it to be a dissolute tauerne, where the noble men got the souldiers fauour that they might be chosen captaines of all the army: like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honourable states and offices of the common weale. Now Eumenes found straight that these peeres of the realme disdained one an other, howbeit that they all feared and mistrusted him, and sought but for oportunity to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupy money, and so borrowed great summe of them specially, whom he knew most hated him: to the end that from thenceforth they should no more distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the money they had lent him. And thereof followed a straunge thing: for other mens money and goods, was the safety of his life. For where others giue money to saue their liues, he by taking of money saued his owne life. Now for the souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whilest they saw they were without daunger of enemies to make them afraied, they still hung vpon them that gaue them, being desirous to be made Generalles: and came euery morning to their vprising to waite vpon them, and follow them whersoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puisant army, and that their case required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the souldiers alone, but all the peeres and states besides, (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit them selues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundement. For when Antigonus assaied all the wayes he could to passe ouer the riuer of Pasitigris, the peeres which were layed in diuers places to let him from passing ouer, heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eumenes onely that resisted him and fought with him: where he slew such a number of his men, that he filled the riuer with them, and tooke foure thousand of them prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was sicke, these olde bandes did more plainely shew what opinion they had of him, and of others: to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheare at their houses, yet that Eumenes was of all other was worthiest to be their Captaine, and to commaund them. For Peucestas hauing feasted them in the kingdom of PERSIA, & giuen euery souldier a mutton to sacrifice, thought he had won great fauor and credit among them. But shortly after, as the army marched against their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerously sicke, and therefore was of needes be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noise, because he could take no rest. But they had not gone farre, before they saw their enemies, which hauing passed ouer certaine litle hils betweene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the souldiers saw the glistering of the gilt armors of their enemies, that glared in the sunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephantes with the towers vpon their backs, and the men at armes with their purple coates vpon their armors: (which was the apparell they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremost staied vpon hill, and cried out, willing them to send for Eumenes to leade them, for they would else go no further, for they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raised their pikes, and laid downe their shields at their feete, calling from one to another to stay, and to their priuate Captaines also: and tolde them plainly, that they would not sturre a foote from thence, nor fight at all, vnlesse Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speede, hastening his slaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on euery side, he held out his right hand to the souldiers, and tolde them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The souldiers also so soone as they sawe him, saluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their shields, clapping them against their pikes with a great shoute, bidding their enemies come when they would, they should be hanged withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other side, being informed by certaine prisoners which his souldiers had taken in skirmish, that Eumenes was very sore sicke, and by reason thereof was caried in a litter: thought nowe he should haue no great a do to discomfit the rest of the army, and therefore made all possible speede he could to fight. But when he came so neere, that he might easily see the order and countenance of his his enemies, who were set in such good order of battell, that it could not any wayes be amended: he was much amased withall, and pawsed a great while, and in the meane time spied Eumenes litter a farre off, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloude, as his manner was, and turning him selfe to his friends, sayd: See, sayd he, I beleeue yonder litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with those wordes, he sounded the retreat, and brought his men backe againe into his campe. When this feare was a little passed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old traide againe, the peeres to flatter the souldiers, and the souldiers to waxe braue and stout against their Captaines: so that when they came to take their garrisons for the winter time, they deuided immaner among them the whole country of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a thousand furlongs off. Which Antigonus vnderstanding, determined to fee vpon them, they misdoubting nothing. And so went sodainely towardes them, by a shorter way then that he had already came, but the worser way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if hee met them thus dispersed a sunder, their Captaines could not readily assemble them all togeather. But while he was in this his iourney, in the desert crooked way, he was so ouertaken, and with such boisterous windes and extreame bitter cold, that his souldiers could go no further, but were forced to tary still, to prouide them present remedy against the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knew of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines, towardes the desert, being amased to see such a number of fires in the valley, sent presently with speede vppon two camels light loden, to aduertise Peucestas, who being nearest vnto the mountaines was so feared with these newes, that he was at his wittes end, not knowing what to do. For, seeing his other companions as much afraied as him selfe, he fled vpon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quicted this great feare, assuring them that he would lay the sodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they should come three daies later then they looked for; which they beleeued. Then did Eumenes send messengers into euery quarter to all the Captaines, commaunding them speedily to put their men in readinesse, and to meete him at a certaine place which he appointed. Him selfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to choose a fitte ground to lodge a campe, the which might easily be seene from the toppe of the mountaines, which they must passe that come from the desert: and there fortified the same with trenches, and deuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, such a distance off one from an other; as they vse commonly to make in a campe. It was no sooner done, but Antigonus came to the toppe of the mountaines, and saw these fires a farre off, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had long before knowen of his comming, and that they came against him. Being afrayd therefore least his enemies would compell him to fight, comming fresh vppon him, his owne men being weary and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that desert countrey: hee tooke his way to lead backe his army, not the nearest way by the which he came, but through the country richly inhabited and replenished with great cities and good townes, to refresh his ouer-wearied people. Yet seeing he had none alaroms giuen, nor any skirmishes offered him, (as they vse commonly when both armies are neare together) and that the valley men told him that they had seene none other army but his, sauing that round about there was store of fires: then he straight mistrusted that it was one of Eumenes strategemes of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to steale vpon him, but to put all to the hazard of battell. But in the meane time, the most part of the hoast was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimation euery man had of his wisdome and sufficiency: insomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant generall should commaund the whole army. This spited the two Captains of the Argyraspides, Antigenes & Teutamus, who bare him such an inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practised his death: and assembling together with many of the states & particular Captains, they sat in councell to know when, & in what sort they should kill him. Howbeit the most voices assembled in this councell, were whole of opinion, that they should take the benefit of his seruice in leading the battell, & that immediatly gods appointed none other iudges to reuenge the disloyaltie and treason of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captaines, for betraying of Eumenes, but Antigonus selfe: who detesting [illegible] cruell murderers, and periured persons to the goddes, appointed Ibyrtius Gouernour [illegible] prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euery mothers sonne what way he could, that [illegible] of them might euer see MACEDON againe, nor the Greekish sea.

HEre haue we set downe the things worthie memory of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were [illegible] a like: that they being strangers in a strange countrie, and banished out of their owne, had alwaies bene Captaines of diuers nations, and chiefetaines of great and warlicke armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his faction gaue him the chiefest place of authority, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to command: where Eumenes hauing many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his [illegible] deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the same. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine: and for their owne safety gaue place to the other, seeing themselues vnable to command. For Sertorius being a ROMAINE, gouerned the SPANIARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHERRONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of which, the SPANIARDS of long time had bene subiect, to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had subdued all the world. Furthermore, Sertorius being [illegible] great estimation for that he was a Senatour of ROME, and had had charge of men of [illegible] before, came to the dignity and estate to be chiefetaine of a great army. Where Eumenes [illegible] with small reputation, disdained for that he was but a secretarie: and when he began to [illegible] forwardes, had not only lesse meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets and impediments also, to hinder his rising and estimation. For many openly stood against him, [illegible] secretly conspired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter ende, when certaine of his companions secretly conspired against him. Therefore Sertorius ende of all his dangers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greatest dangers came through his victories which he wanne of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honour. Now for their deedes of armes, they are both [illegible] ner a like: but on the other side for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention: and Sertorius imbraced peace & quietnes. For, Eumenes that might haue lined in [illegible] tie with honor, if he would but haue giuen place to his betters, and forsaken the warres [illegible]

with the daunger of his life to followe martiall feates, with the greateſt perſonages of LACEDÆMON, and in the end ſo came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come to warre, was forced for the ſafetie of his perſon to take armes againſt them, that would not haue him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes bene ſo ambitious and ſtout to ſtriue againſt Antigonus for the chiefeſt place of authoritie, but could haue beene contented with the ſeconde, Antigonus would haue bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer ſo much as ſuffer Sertorius to liue in reſt. So, the one made voluntary warre onely to rule, and the other againſt his will was cõpelled to rule, becauſe they made wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferring the couetous deſire of a better eſtate, aboue the ſafetie of his life, and the other as a right ſouldier, vſed the warres only for a meane to ſaue his life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was ſlaine, miſtruſting no treaſon againſt him: and the other, looking euery houre for preſent death threatned him. Whereof the one ſhewed a noble minde, not to miſtruſt them whom he thought his friends: and the other ſhewed a faint heart, being taken when he ment to flie. So Sertorius death diſhonored not his life, ſuffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him ſuffer. The other hauing no power to auoide his deſtinie before he was taken, and hauing ſought by meanes to liue being in priſon and captiuitie: could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For, begging life at his enemies handes, he gaue him his heart with his body, who before had but his bodie in his power.

Sertorius death more honeſt, then the death of Eumenes.

THE LIFE OF Ageſilaus.

Archidamus the ſon of Zeuxidamus, hauing honorably raigned in LACEDÆMON, left two ſons behind him: Agis which he begate of that noble lady Lampridо, & Ageſilaus a great deale yonger, which he had by Eupolia, Meliſſippidas daughter. So the kingdom falling by ſucceſſion vnto Agis the elder, the yonger ſonne Ageſilaus remaining a priuate perſon, was brought vp after the LACONIAN maner, which was a ſtraight kind of life: but withal it taught childrē how to obey. Whereof it is thought the poet Simonides calleth SPARTA, Damaſimbrotos: to wit, making men ciuil: for that by continuance of cuſtome, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much or more than any other citie that euer was in the world taming them from their childhood, as they doe young colts. The law dispenseth with the heires apparant to the crowne, from that straight subiection and hard life: but Agesilaus had that excellencie in him aboue all others of his estate, that he came to the dignitie and honor to command, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoubtedly was the cause, that he knewe better than any other king, how to please and beare with his subiects, helping his roiall estate & princely behauior grafted in him by nature, with that courtesie and familiaritie which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lysander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modestie of his wit. For hauing better spirite, and being more constant in his opinion, than any of the other children, striuing euer to excell in all things, with such a vehemency he tooke all trauels in hande, that it was vnpossible to ouercome him, much lesse to compell him. He was on the other side so milde & gentle, that euery curteous word wrought in him better obedience, than any feare could doe: because it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take pain on him any paine or labor. And for the deformitie of his legge, the one being shorter than the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasant wit, hee vsed the matter so pleasantly and patiently, that he would merrily mocke himselfe: which maner of merry behauiour did greatly hide the blame of the blemish. Yea further, his life & courage was the more commendable in him, for that men saw that notwithstanding his lameneſse, he refused no paines nor labour. Of his person we haue drawen no counterfaite, because he would not in any wise haue it drawen, and did expressely commaund by his will, that they should neither draw his picture nor make any mould or image of his body. Howbeit wee finde that he was of small stature, whereby his presence promised no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer merry & pleasant, and neuer pensiue nor troublesome in word nor looke, euen to the last end of his life he was better loued, than the most faire creature that liued. Notwithstanding the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a summe of money because he maried a litle woman: saying that he would beget them demy kings, no kings indeed. In the time that his eldest sonne Agis raigned king, Alcibiades being banished Athens fled out of Sicile into Lacedæmon, & had not long remained in Sparta before they suspected him that he kept king Agis wife, called Timæa: for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the child she brought to be his sonne, saying that Alcibiades had begotte him. But Timæa cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as she sate amongst her women, softly she called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other side they report, that Alcibiades himselfe said, it was for no hurt he ment to any man, that he lay with Queene Timæa, but onely for the desire he had that some of the kings of Lacedæmon should be begotten of his seede. Nouertheleſse at the length he was driuen to forsake Lacedæmon, mistrusting king Agis, who euer after doubted of the child, & thought him a bastard: vntill such time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and so behaued himselfe, that Agis before many witnesses, saide he did acknowledge him for his sonne. This notwithstanding, when king Agis was dead, Lysander that had then ouercome the Athenians by sea, and was more in credit and authority in the city of Sparta, than any other: practised to put the crowne vpon Agesilaus head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest vnto it, because he was a bastard. The like did diuerse other citizens say of him, which loued Agesilaus vertue, and liked him passingly, for that he had bene brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrary part also there was a Soothsaier or wisard in Sparta called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta: and for proofe thereof he told this ancient oracle before the councell.

Agesilaus learned to obey, before he came to commaund.

A lame king.

As stately as thy stomacke is ô Sparta take good heede, And stand vpon thy gard, and looke about thee I thee reede.
For halting one day downe will cast thine Empire to the ground, By meane of warres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.

Lysander replied against it, saying, that if the Spartans were afraide of this oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For the goddes cared not, if any man lame of a foote

aspired to be king: but rather if he were a bastard, & not lineally descended of the race of Hercules. For that, said he, were to make the kingdome halt. Agesilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune himselfe had witnessed, that Leotychides was a bastard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiues chamber, and that tenne monethes after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Agesilaus vpon these allegations not onely proclaimed king of Sparta, but he had giuen him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a bastard. Notwithstanding, considering that his parentes by his mothers side were very poore, (yet honest men) he left them the moytie of all the goods: by which act, Agesilaus wonne all their good willes, where else they had enuied him for his succession in the kingdome. And (as Xenophon saith) by obeying his countrie, he grew to such power that he might do whatsoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the sway and gouernment of the common wealth, the Ephores office changing yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were only ordained to bridle the insolency of the kings, lest that they should not (as we haue more amply written in Lycurgus life) haue absolute power in their handes. Vpon this occasion, the kings that succeeded in the gouernement, had (as it were) by inheritance, a present grudge and malice against them. This notwithstanding, Agesilaus tooke a contrary course to all his predecessors. For where others presently quarelled with the Ephori and Senatours, Agesilaus did honor and reuerence them, and would neuer attempt any matter without their priuity, but was alwaies readie to goe when they did send for him. When he was set in his chaire of state to giue audience, if any of the Ephori chanced to come in, he would rise vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honors sake present him a gowne and an oxe. And thus cunningly seeming to honor and increase the dignitie of the Senators, winning their good wils, he made his power great, and the same much greater. Furthermore, his behauiour towards the rest of his countrimen was such, as his enmity was lesse faulty then his friendship. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iust cause, but he aided his friends euen in vniust causes. And wheras he thought it a shame not to honor enemies, whē they had done well: he could not find in his hart to rebuke his friends when they did amisse, but rather gloried in succouring & helping of them in their euil doings. For he thought it no shame to serue his friendes turne, howsoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduersaries offended, he was as sorie for it as any man, and as ready to beare with it if he were intreated: whereby he allured and wanne the hearts of all men. The Ephori seeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in money for that he made the common loue of his countrie priuate to himselfe. For, as naturall Philosophers holde opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of nature, it would come to passe that the heauenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all things should be at a stay, by reason of the mutuall agreement betweene the world and them: euen so, the lawmaker of Lacedæmon seemeth to haue allowed ambition & strife in the common wealth, as a spurre to vertue by procuring alwaies some contention and emulation among great persons. And his reason was that this soft and effeminate fauour, in winking one at an other when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concord. And sure some thinke that Homer also saw the same, for he would neuer else haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to see Vlysses and Achilles at great wordes together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contention among great men, were very auaileable for the common wealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and doe bring great dangers with them. Now when Agesilaus was entred into his kingdome of Lacedæmon, newes were brought him out of Asia, that the king of Persia prepared a great nauy to conquer the Lacedæmonians signiory by sea. Lysander being glad of this occasion, longing to be sent againe into Asia to succour his friends whom he had left there as Gouernors & Lieutenants of cities & prouinces (of the which, some of them were driuen away by their citizens, others also put to death for abusing of their authority & ruling ouer cruelly:) perswaded Agesilaus to goe into Asia, to make warre vpon this barbarous king, farre from Greece, before his army were gathered together. And to cōpasse this the easilier, he wrote vnto his friends in Asia that they should send vnto Sparta to require Agesilaus for their Captaine, and so they Agesilaus, an vprighter enemy than a friend.

Whether contention among the nobilitie be profitable in a common wealth did. Thereupon Ageſilaus going to the aſſembly of the people, accepted the charge, with[out] dition that they would giue him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counſellers & [a]ſtants to him in theſe warres, two thouſand free ILOTES, and ſix thouſand of the confed[erates] of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediatly granted through Lyſanders friendſhippe to[ward] him, and he was ſent away ſtraight with the thirtie Captaines which he had requeſted, [a]mong which Lyſander was the chiefeſt, not only for his riches and authority, but alſo for the [good] will he bare vnto Ageſilaus. who thought himſelf more beholding to him for procuring [him] this charge, than for his friendſhip he ſhewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Ageſilaus army being aſſembled at the hauen of Gereſtæ, himſelfe with certaine of his friends went to the citie of AVLIDE, where in his ſleepe he dreamd that one ſaid vnto him: O king of LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knoweſt that neuer none but Agamemnon, and now thy ſelfe, were ſen Generall of all GREECE, conſidering therefore that thou commaundeſt the ſame [people] he did; that thou makeſt warres with the ſelfe ſame enemies, departing from the ſelfe [ſame] place to goe thither, it is reaſon that thou make the ſelfe ſame ſacrifice vnto the goddeſſe which he made at his like departure. Ageſilaus ſtraight vpon this viſion, remembred [that] Agamemnon through the perſwaſion of the Soothſaiers did ſacrifice his owne daughter in the ſame place. Yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and [ſaid] he would ſacrifice that vnto the goddeſſe, which he thought would pleaſe her well [enough] and that he would not followe that cruell deuotion of this auncient Captaine. Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a hynde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commanded the Soothſaier to ſacrifice her: and would not ſuffer him to haue the honour to doe the ſacrifice that was appointed for the ſame purpoſe by the Gouernors of BOEOTIA, according to the cuſtome of that place. The Gouernors of BOEOTIA vnderſtanding it, were much offended and ſent their officers to will Ageſilaus not to doe any ſacrifice there, contrary to the [ancient] cuſtome of their countrie. The officers that were ſent, performed their commiſſion and [bad]ding that the beaſt was ſlaine, & the quarters of it vpon the aulter, they tooke and flong them off the aulter euery way. This vexed Ageſilaus being readie to imbarke, and departed thence [with] choler againſt the THEBANS, and miſtruſted much his good ſucceſſe by this vnluckie preſen[tation], which ſeemed to prognoſticate vnto him, that he ſhould not preuaile according to his deſire. Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHESVS, he preſently miſliked the honour [that] ſaw done vnto Lyſander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the countrimen repaired continually to his houſe, that when he came abroade, they all followed him whoſoeuer he went: as though Lyſander had indeede bene in authority to do what he would, and that Ageſilaus only had but the name to be generall, ſo appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in truth there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine in thoſe partes that had won him ſuch reputation, nor that was more feared than he: nor there was neuer man that was more bendie to his friends, neither alſo that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All theſe things being [ſtill] in memorie, the countriemen of that country perceiuing the ſimplicity of Ageſilaus, and that he was giuen to pleaſe the people, and caried no great maieſtie nor countenance with him, and obſeruing in Lyſander that wonted roughnes and ſharpe ſpeech wherewith they had been acquainted before: euery man obeyed him, and nothing was done but what he commaunded. This firſt of all made the other SPARTANS angrie, for that it appeared they were come [not] were to ſerue Lyſander, and not as to counſell the king: but after that, Ageſilaus himſelfe grew miſcontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor ſorie to ſee others honored beſides himſelfe. Yet being a man ambitiouſly giuen, and of a noble courage, ſaid if he ſhould doe any noble exploit in this warre, that they would impute it vnto Lyſander for the great eſtimation he was of: he firſt beganne to deale in this ſort with him. Firſt he contraried all his counſels: and what matters ſoeuer he preferred, which he was deſirous ſhould haue taken effect, Ageſilaus would none of that, but tooke ſome other in hand. Furthermore if any of Lyſanders followers came to make ſute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lyſander: he ſent them away without any thing done for them. In like caſe also in matters of iudgements, if Lyſander were againſt any, they were ſure to haue the matter [go] on their ſide. On the contrarie part alſo, if Lyſander bare good will to the partie, and fauored the cause to gratifie him: they hardly escaped from setting a fine on their heades. Agesilaus consenting these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chaunce to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lysander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his frendes, but told them plainly that it was for his sake they had those repulses and wronges, and therefore did counsell them to fall vpon the king; and those that had more credit then himselfe. Now Agesilaus supposing he gaue that aduise to make euery man to malice him: wherefore, to despite him the more, he made him distributer of his victuals, (& hauing done so) some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: now let them go and honour my flesh distributer. Lysander being angered withall, sayd vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppresse your frendes. And how I, sayd Agesilaus, how to keepe them vnder, that would be greater then my selfe. It may be, yea replied Lysander, I haue not done as your grace doth say: yet if you so conceiue of me, heare me I beseech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good seruice without offence. After this talke between the, Agesilaus sent him into HELLESPONT, where by practise he tooke prisoner a noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus prouince whereof he was gouernour, & brought him to Agesilaus with a great summe of gold and siluer, and neare about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgate not his grudge to Agesilaus, but being offended still, sought oportunitie and meanes to defeate the two houses of the priuiledge of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broyle (in my opinion) in the city of SPARTA, had he not bene preuented by death, in a iourney he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we see, that ambitious mindes obseruing no meane, are in a common weale oft times more hurtfull, then beneficiall. For though Lysander was indeede intollerable, to shew himselfe so amorous, and out of time: yet was not Agesilaus ignoraunt neither, that there were diuers other matters lesse reprochfull to punish such a noble man, that offended onely by greedinesse of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe pasion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afrayed of Agesilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to set the cities of GREECE in ASIA at liberty. Notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed warre. Agesilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through all GREECE, that he would do some noble exploit in this iourney. Moreouer he thought himselfe dishonored for euer, that the ten thousand GRECIANS which were returned backe from the farthest part of ASIA, euen vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had quercome the king of PERSIAES army as oft as they listed themselues: and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commaunded both sea and land) should not do some deede worthy memorie among the GRECIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periurie by iust deceit, he made a countenaunce as though he would first inuade the country of CARIA. Whereupon, this barbarous person Tisaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Agesilaus on a sodaine returned backe againe, and entred into PHRYGIA, tooke there many cities, and wanne great riche, making his men see by experience, that to infringe & breake a league made & auowed by oth, was a sacrilege, and contemning of the goddes. On the other side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not onely iust and honorable: but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agesilaus being weaker in horsemen then his enemy, and finding the liuers of the beastes which he had sacrificed, without heades, returned into the citie of EPHESVS, and there gathered horsemen together, letting the richmen vnderstand (which would not themselues serue in person) that he did dispense with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them tooke that course, & by this meanes Agesilaus within few dayes had leuied a great number of men of armes, in stead of footemen that could do small seruice. For they that were vnwilling to go to the warres, did hier them that were willing to serue in their place; and such also as would not serue a horseback, did giue them pay that were desirous to serue in their steades. In this he wisely followed king Agamemnons example, who did dispense with the person of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Ageſilaus had commaunded them that ſold the priſoners by the drumme taken in the warres, that they ſhould ſtrippe them naked, & ſo ſell them: which they did. And ſundry perſons willingly bought their ſpoyles and rayment, but they ſcorned their bodies, becauſe they ſaw them white skinned, ſoft, and delicate: ſo that few men would out bid price for them, for that they thought thoſe men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Ageſilaus alſo being preſent at this ſale of purpoſe, ſayd thus vnto his men. See, my friends, quoth he, theſe be the men againſt whom ye are to fight, and here be the ſpoyles for the which ye ſhall fight. Time being come now to put himſelfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies countrey againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tiſaphernes againe, but Tiſaphernes deceiued himſelfe. For he being deceiued before by Ageſilaus, gaue no credit to this ſecond rumour, but perſwaded himſelfe that doubtleſſe Ageſilaus ment then to enter into CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woddie country, very ill for horſemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithſtading, Ageſilaus inuading (as he had giuen it out) the champion country, in the which ſtood SARDIS, the capitall city of LYDIA: Tiſaphernes was compelled to come to reſcue it in haſt, and being come thither with great ſpeede with his horſemen, he ſtale vpon many of his enemies whom he found ſtraggling out of order, ſpoyling the country, & put the moſt of them to the ſword. Ageſilaus hauing intelligence of this, imagined with himſelfe that the footemen of his enemy could not yet be arriued, and conſidering alſo that he had his army whole about him: thought it beſt forthwith to bid him battell, rather then to lay time any longer. Therupon he thruſt in among the horſemen his light armed footemen, & commaunded them ſtraight to charge the enemy, whileſt he cauſed the heauier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled vpon it immediatly: & the GRECIANS luſtily following the chaſe, tooke their camp, and made great ſlaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leaſure enough not onely to ſpoyle & ouerrun the kings country at their pleaſure, but alſo to ſee the reuenge taken of Tiſaphernes, that was a wicked man, and a cruell enemy to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made an other his Lieutenaunt immediatly in his roome, called Tithrauſtes: who ſtrake off Tiſaphernes head, and ſent it vnto Ageſilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him ſtore of gold and ſilver to depart out of his country. Thereto Ageſilaus aunſwered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that for his owne part, it was an eaſier matter to enrich his ſouldiers, than himſelfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it diſhonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then ſpoyles. This notwithſtanding, to gratifie Tithrauſtes ſomewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the ſumme of thirtie talents giuen him to defray his charges, he withdrew his army out of LYDIA, & went into PHRYGIA. In his iourney he receiued from the counſell of LACEDÆMON, the Scytala, or ſcrolle of parchement wreathed about, aduertiſing him that the citizens had made him alſo their Generall by ſea, as he was by land. Ageſilaus onely of all men obtained this honour, who without compariſon was of all other the worthieſt man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witneſſeth: & yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnes of his authority. In this notwithſtanding he was to be blamed, that he made choyſe of one Piſander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenant of the nauy, and ſo paſſed other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: ſeeking rather to pleaſe his wife, & to aduaunce one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and ſafety of his country. After which he led his army into Pharnabazus country which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all ſortes of victuals, but gathered together alſo a wonderfull maſſe of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with king Cotys, who for his vertue and conſtant fidelitie, was very deſirous of his friendſhip. The like did Spithridates, forſaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Ageſilaus: and after he was come to him, neuer went from him, but alwayes followed him whereſoeuer he went. Spithridates had a young ſonne that was paſſing fayre, called Megabetes, (of whom Ageſilaus had great liking) & likewiſe a fayre young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Ageſilaus caſt for king Cotys to mary. So, taking of king Cotys a thouſand horſemen and two thouſand footmen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there deſtroyed Pharnabazus coun-which he had in gouernement, who durst not meete him in the field, nor truste to his holdes, but fled from him, carying all his chiefest things with him, flitting from place to place: vntill that Spithridates, accompanied with Erippidas the SPARTAN, followed him so neare, that he tooke his campe, and all his treasure in it. But there did Erippidas shew himselfe so hard and cruell, ouerstraightly searching out part of the spoyle that had bene imbeaceled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ransacking euery corner for it: that Spithridates was so offended withall, that on a sodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, & went backe vnto the citie of SARDIS. This more grieued Agesilaus, the any thing that happened to him in all his iourney: for that he had lost so valiant a man as Spithridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he caried away with him. Moreouer, he was afrayed least they would detect him of miserable couetousnesse; a thing which he euer was carefull to auoide not only in his own person, but also to keepe all his countrymen from it. But besides these seuen causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates sonne pinched him nearely: though when the boy was with him, he striued with his owne nature to subdue that haughty affection and desire of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him, & to kisse him: Agesilaus turned his face from the boy. The boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloofe of. Agesilaus then repenting him that he had not allowed Megabates to kisse him, made as though he maruelled why he did not kisse him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: your selfe, O king, is in fault, because you durst not tarie, but were afrayed to kisse so fayre a boy. For if he knew your minde, he would come againe, so that you turned your face no more away. When Agesilaus had heard them, he paused a while, and sayd neuer a word, but in fine answered them: I shall not neede you say any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuse such a one kisse againe, then if all that I see before me were gold. Thus was Agesilaus disposed while Megabates was with him: but in his absence he did so loue him, that I dare safely say, that if the boy had come againe into his presence, he would haue refused a kisse at his hands. After this Pharnabazus sought to speake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend vnto them both. Agesilaus was he first that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he layed him downe vpon the deepe grasse in the shadow, vnder a fayre great tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, & they had soft skinnes long haired, and tapestry excellently wrought of diuers colours, for him to sit vpon the ground. But being ashamed to see Agesilaus layed on the bare ground in that sort, he also lay downe by him, though he had vpon him a maruellous rich gowne, of excellent fine and passing colour. Now when they had embraced one an other, Pharnabazus began first to speake, and lacked no good perswasions & iust complaints, for that he hauing bene (he was) a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre against the ATHENIANS, was thus spoyled and sacked by them. Agesilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung down their heads for shame, not knowing how to answere him, considering that Pharnabazus had iniury offered him: began to speake in this manner. Heretofore we were friends with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vsed his goods like our owne, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vse them: and since we see that thou of necessities be a slaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his sake. But when thou shalt rather chuse to be a friend of the GRECIANS, then a slaue to the king of PERSIA: then make account, that all these souldiers, this armour, our ships, and all we are to defend thy goods and thee against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly: surely, sayd he, if the king do send him any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be sure I will then take your part straight. But on the other side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this warre, truste to it, I will do him the worst seruice I can against you. This answere passingly pleased Agesilaus, who taking him by the hand, and rising vp with him, said vnto him. I would wish (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing so noble a minde as thou hast, that thou were rather our friend, then an enemy. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his sonne being left behind, ranne to Agesilaus, and willing told him, King Agesilaus, I will make thee my friend: & therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hand. Ageſilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beautie of the young youth and the curteſie he had offred him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might beſtow on him. At the laſt he ſpied his ſecretarie Adeus horſe, which had a rich capariſſon on: he ſtraight tooke it from him, and gaue the horſe & furniture to the liuely youth Pharnabazus ſonne, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunced afterwardes that being driuen out of his country by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Ageſilaus made very much of him, and did not ſticke to further him in his loue abroad. For he had great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought vp in wreſtling, one day to play for the beſt games. But when he was growen a bigge man and ſtrong, and that he came to offer himſelfe to be billed with them that ſhould wraſtle at the games Olympicall, being in ſome perill to be vtterly refuſed: this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Ageſilaus and beſought his helpe, that this wraſtler might not receiue the foyle to be reiected. Ageſilaus being deſirous to pleaſure him, performed his requeſt with ſome difficultie. Thus Ageſilaus in all things elſe was a ſtraight obſeruer of the law: but in his friendes cauſes to be ſtraight laced in matters of iuſtice, he ſayd that was but an excuſe for them that would do nothing for their friendes. To this effect, they finde a letter of his written vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his friend. If Nicias haue not offended, let him go: if he haue offended, then pardon him for my ſake. But howſoeuer it be, let him go. This was Ageſilaus manner in the moſt part of his friends cauſes. Notwithſtanding, occaſions fell out oftentimes, that he was inclined to the benefit of the common wealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haſt on a ſodaine, and to leaue one ſicke behind him whom he loued dearely: the ſicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, beſought him that he would not forſake him. Ageſilaus (as Hieronymus the Philoſopher reporteth) turned backe again and ſayd: O how hard is it both to loue, and to be wiſe. Now had Ageſilaus ſpent two yeares in this warre, and was ſpoken of throughout ASIA, being maruelliouſly commended of the king himſelfe, for his great honeſtie, his continencie, his curteſie and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the country with his owne trayne onely, he would enter into the holyeſt temples of the goddes: becauſe he would the goddes themſelues ſhould be witneſſes of his priuate doings, whereas commonly we are loth that men ſhould ſee what we do. Furthermore, amongſt ſo many thouſand ſouldiers as were in his camp, there could hardly be found a worſe mattriſſe, then that himſelfe did lye vpon euery night. And as for heate and cold, he could as eaſily away with either of both, as if by conſtitution of body he had bene borne to abide any weather and ſeaſon. But aboue all, it was a pleaſant ſight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they ſaw the great Lords, the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA, (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and giuen to all luſt and pleaſure) honour and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, being afrayed of euery bare word that he ſpake like a LACONIAN: inſomuch as many of them called to minde Timotheus the Poetes verſes, who ſayd,

As Mars hath no mercy, ſo Greece ſcorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yeelding to him in euery matter he had taken order with the cities, and had eſtabliſhed the libertie of their common wealth without any bloudſhed, or baniſhment of any perſon: he determined to go further, into the land, and tranſporting the warres from the ſea coaſtes of GREECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper perſon, and with the wealth and happineſſe of the ECBATANIANS and the SVSIANIANS, and by that meanes to take his leaſure from him, who ſitting ſtill had made the GRECIANS make warre one with an other, by force of money, corrupting the gouernours of euery city. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuouſly troubled with warres, enforced on them by their owne GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephori did ſend for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his country.

Grecians? Who ouerthrew their good fortune that made thē happy before, turning their warres against the barbarous people, out of Greece, and now to bring it against themselues. I am not of Demaratus opinion the Corinthian, that sayd the Grecians delight was taken from them, which saw not Alexander the great sitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would thinke they should haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander & the Macedonians, fondly losing so many famous Captaines of Greece, at the battels of Leuctres, of Coronea, of Corinthe, and of Arcadia. Neuertheless, Agesilaus neuer did better Agesilaus obedience to his country. in his life, nor euer shewed better example of obedience and iustice due to his country, then he did in his returne home. For sith Hannibal that began to haue ill successe in his warres, being in manner driuen out of Italie, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his country, to obey his countrymen, which called him home to defend the warre the Romaines made at their owne doores: and that Alexander the great also being sent for home vpon the like occasion did not onely refuse to returne into Macedon, but made a iest at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenaunt Antipater had fought with king Agis, saying, me thinkes when I heare these newes, whilest we are ouercomming of king Darius here, there hath bene a battell of rattes fought in Arcadia. Sith then (I say) these two famous Captaines haue made so litle account of their country, may we not thinke the citie of Sparta blessed to haue had such a king, that so much reuerenced his country and obeyed the law as receiuing onely a litle scrolle of parchement commaunding him to returne, he forsooke a world of goodes and wealth that he quietly enioyed (with assured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked forthwith, leauing all the allies and confederates of his country very sorowfull, for that he had giuen ouer so noble an enterprise, which he had so happely begun? Yes sure. Nay furthermore, he passed not for the saying of Demostratus Phæacian, who sayd, that the Lacedæmonians in publicke matters were the worthiest men, and the Athenians in priuate causes. For as he had shewed himselfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the common wealth: so was he alwayes curteous priuately to his familiar friends. And because the Persian coyne was stamped on the one side, with the print of an archer: Agesilaus being ready to depart, sayd, that Agesilaus darke speaches. ten thousand archers draue him out of Asia. For so much was brought vnto Thebes and Athens, and distributed among the Oratours and Gouernours there, who through their Orations made both those great cities to rise, and make warre against the Spartans. In his returne, Agesilaus hauing passed the straight of Hellespont, tooke his way through the coūtry of Thracia, and neuer intreated barbarous king nor people to suffer him to passe, but onely sent vnto them to know whether they would he should passe through the countryes as a friend, or an enemy. All countryes and nations else receiued him very honorably to their power, saue the people called the Trochalians, vnto whō king Xerxes himselfe gaue promise that he might passe friendly through their country: who sent vnto Agesilaus to demaund a hundred siluer talents, and a hundred women to suffer him to passe through their country. But Agesilaus laughing them to scorne, aunswered againe: why, how chanceth it that they came not themselues to receiue them? So there withall he marched forward against these barbarous people who were ranged in battell ray to stoppe his passage: howbeit he ouerthrew them, and slue a great number of them in the field. The like demaund he made vnto the king of Macedon, whether he should passe through his country as a friend, or an enemie. The king made him aunswere, he would consider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quoth Agesilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldnesse, and fearing least he would do him some hurt as he went: sent to pray him that he would passe through his country as a friend. Now it chanced so that the Thessalians at that time were in league with the enemies of the Lacedæmonians: therefore as he passed through their countrey, he did spoyle and forrage it as his enemies country, and sent Xenocles & Scytha to the citie of Larisse, hoping to perswade them to take part with the Lacedæmonians. These two Ambassadours were retained there as prisoners. The Spartans were maruellously offended withall: & thought good that Agesilaus should besiege Larisse with his army. But he aunswered them, he would not lose one of those men, to winne all Thessalie:

and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by compoſition. Peraduenture this is not to be maruelled at in Ageſilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in great battell fought by the citie of CORINTHE, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines ſlaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS: he ſeemed not to reioyce at it, but rather to fetch a grieuous ſigh, ſaying, O poore GREECE, how vnfortunate art thou to haue ſlaine with thine owne handes ſo many valiant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue ouercome all the barbarous people. The PHARSALIANS harying and troubling the rereward of Ageſilaus army, he put forth fiue hundred horſemen which gaue them ſo luſty a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he ſet vp tokens of triumph vpon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victory pleaſed him aboue all the reſt, becauſe with the ſmall number of horſemen which he had gotten together of himſelfe, he had ouerthrowen the glory and pride of the enemies horſemen in battell, whom of they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, ſent of purpoſe from SPARTA, to commaund him immediatly to inuade BOEOTIA with his armie. Now though Ageſilaus intended ſome other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet becauſe he would not diſobey the counſels commaundement of SPARTA, he told his men ſtraight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA, was at hand, and therefore he ſent for two companies of them which lay in camp by CORINTHE. The LACEDÆMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honour Ageſilaus for that he had obeyed their commaundement ſo readily: proclaimed in the citie, that as many young men as were deſirous to go aide the king, ſhould come and enter their names. Notwithſtanding, they only choſe but fiftie of the valianteſt among them, and ſent them vnto him. In the meane time, Ageſilaus paſſed through the country of THERMOPYLES, and coaſting ouer the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDÆMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHÆRONEA: where immediatly after his arriuall, he ſodainly ſaw the ſunne eclipſed, and darkened in the faſhion of a new moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Piſander vnto him, who was ſlaine in a battel which he loſt by ſea, fighting againſt Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. Theſe newes were very heauy vnto him, both for reſpect of the perſon his kinſeman whom he loſt, as alſo for the great loſſe that happened to the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, fearing his ſouldiers would be diſcouraged with the newes, and become faint harted, being ready to ioyne battell: he commaunded them that came from the ſea, to brute abroad a contrary tale to that they told him, and he himſelfe to make good their ſpeach, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did ſacrifice to the goddes, as thanking them for the good newes, ſending to euery one of his friends a piece of fleſh ſacrificed, as he commonly vſed to do, in any publike cauſe of ioy. Then marching forward, he ſtraight diſcouered his enemies farre off, & they likewiſe him: and thereupon put his men in battell ray, & gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himſelf the right wing. The THEBANS on the other ſide, placed themſelues in the right wing of their army, & gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophō being at that battel on Ageſilaus ſide, writeth that he neuer knew of the like field fought. At the firſt onſet, the conflict was not great between both, neither held long, becauſe the THEBANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS ſtraight, and Ageſilaus the ARGIVES. But when either ſide vnderſtood that the left wings of their battels were in great diſtreſſe, and that they turned their backes: they returned ſodainly againe. And where Ageſilaus might eaſily haue had the victory without any daunger, if he had ſuffred the ſquadrons of the enemies to paſſe by him, & afterwards to haue charged them in the rereward: of a noble courage to ſhew his valiantneſſe, he gaue charge vpon the voward, to haue honour in ouercomming them. The THEBANS on the other ſide no leſſe valiantly receiued him, and fought luſtily on all handes: but the cruelleſt fight was about Ageſilaus perſon, with the fiftie young men that were ſent to gard him, who ſhewed themſelues very valiant. Ageſilaus was ſore hurt notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſtance, his armour being paſſed through with their pikes & ſwordes in ſundry places: whereupon they enuironned him round amongſt them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of thē, & many of themſelues alſo being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too ſtrōg in the voward they were forced to do that which they refuſed refused at the first: and opening themselues, gaue them passage thorow them. So when they were passed them, the SPARTANS perceiuing how losely and disorderly they marched, as thinking themselues out of all danger, followed them, and gaue charge vpon ther flancke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they reioycing for their victorie at this battell, retired faire and softly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Agesilaus, notwithstanding he was very sore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dressed before he had bene first at the place where the battell was fought, and had seene his men that were slaine brought away in their armors. As many of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerua Itonian, which was not far from thence: (where also were set vp tokens of triumphe offred vnto her long time before by the THEBANS, when they had ouercome the armie of the ATHENIANS, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had slaine also Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his men they should let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Agesilaus desirous to see if the THEBANS had any courage to come downe to fight againe: commanded his souldiers to put garlands vpon their heads, and his musitians to sound their shalmes or pipes, whilest he did set vp a token of triumph as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies sending to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the citie of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were plaide, he made a solemne procession and common sacrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth parte of all his spoiles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the summe of an hundred talents. This thing done, he returned into his countrie, where he was greatly honored and esteemed of all his citizens and countrimen, for his orderly life and noble behauiour: for he was no changeling, but the selfe same man in state & condition that he was before he tooke his iorney. He transformed not himselfe into strangers maners, as commonly other Captaines do, that resume out of a farre countrie where they haue made warres: neither did he scorne his countrie fashions, or shewed himselfe disobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwaies kept and obserued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate or drinke, in washing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armory, or any way else in his houshold stuffe, as if he had neuer passed ouer the riuer of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his olde gates standing that were of so great continuance, that they were thought to be those which Aristodemus had set vp. Xenophon also saith, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more sumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDÆMON, is a kinde of coche or charret after the likenesse of griffins, harts, or goates: vpon the which they caried young wenches in solemne processions in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agesilaus: and Dicearchus also was much offended, that they neither knew Agesilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we finde in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Agesilaus wiues name was Cleora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Agesilaus speare is seene to this day in the citie of SPARTA, euen like vnto others, and no manner of difference. Now Agesilaus perceiuing certaine citizens of SPARTA to stand vpon their reputation, and esteeming themselues aboue others, because they kept horse in their stable: persuaded his sister Cynisca to send her coche and coche horses to the Olympian games to runne for the best prise, thereby to let the GRECIANS see that it was no act of any vertue, but simply of riches and cost. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philosopher about him, whome he loued and made great account of, he persuaded him to send for his sonnes to LACEDÆMON, that they might be brought vp there, where they should learne the noblest science that men could possibly learne, that is to obey, and to commaund. When Lysander was dead, Agesilaus at his returne out of ASIA, found a great faction and conspiracie raised by his meanes against him in SPARTA: and because it might appeare what manner of citizen Lysander was when he liued, he was said to haue openly shewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnasseus had written for him, and Lysander should haue pronounced without booke, to haue spoken in open assembly) that was to stirre innouation, and to manner haue made a change of the whole gouernment of the commonwealth of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit there was a graue counseller that hauing red the oration, and doubting the apparant reasons and persuasions alleaged, tolde him, that he would wish him not to pluck vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to burie this oration together with his bodie. Agesilaus liked the counsell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had bin his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the means to make some of them to be sent as Lieutenant of armie, or otherwise to haue charge in the wars. In fine, he made it openly knowne, what couetous and wicked men they had bene in their charges: so that when they were accused of it before the councell, he would then helpe & intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his friends, where they had bene his enemies: insomuch as in the ende, he had not one enemie at all. For the other king Agesipolis, his colleague, whose father had bin banished: he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernment of the commonwealth. Neuertheless, he so behaued himselfe vnto Agesilaus, that he made him his verie good friend: for both the kings when they were in the citie, did eate together in one hall. Then Agesilaus knowing that Agesipolis (as himselfe) was giuen to loue, would euer minister talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the citie, intising him to loue some one of them, which he himselfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in these LACONIAN loues there was no manner of dishonestie offered, but a true affection and honest regarde to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honest conditions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus.

Teleutias, Agesilaus halfe brother, made Generall of the army by sea.

Agesilaus by this meanes, hauing the whole authoritie (aboue all men in the citie) in his hands: made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by sea, and himselfe with the armie by land went to besiege the citie of CORINTHE, where with his brothers helpe by sea he tooke the long walles of the same. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTHE at that time, at Agesilaus arriuall there were solemnizing the feast of the Isthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from sacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and solemnitie. Then diuerse banished men of CORINTHE that were in his armie, besought him that he would keepe these Isthmian games. But he denied them, yet was contented they should themselues solemnize them, and so himselfe remained there, during the time of the feast, for their safety. Afterwards when Agesilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Isthmian games, and there were some of them which hauing wonne the game at the first, did also winne it at the second time: and others that were victours before, were this second time ouercome. Whereupon Agesilaus said, that the ARGIVES shewed themselues rancke cowards, that esteeming so much (as they did) these plaies and sacrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For himselfe, touching such like sportes and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour such solemne assemblies and common feasts with his presence, as were commonly vsed in SPARTA, and tooke great pleasure to see the sports betweene the young boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent stage plaier (wonderfully esteemed of among the GRECIANS for a singular man in that arte) meeting Agesilaus on a time, at the first did his duetie to him, and then arrogantly thrust himselfe among them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Agesilaus, doe you not knowe me? Agesilaus looking vpon him, aunswered: what, art not thou Callipides the stage plaier? And so made no further account of him. An other time being desired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingalls voice: he would not heare him, saying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingall it selfe. Another time also when Menecrates the Phisitian (hauing by good fortune cured a desperate disease) called himselfe Iupiter, and arrogantly vsurped that name, presuming in a letter he wrote vnto Agesilaus, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto him Agesilaus, greeting: Agesilaus wrote againe vnto him, Agesilaus vnto *Menecrates health. So, whilest Agesilaus was in the territorie of CORINTHE (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his souldiers forraging and spoiling the countrie rounde about: Ambassadours came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he alwaies hated the THEBANS, and besides that thought it then very requisite for the good carelesse of his doings, to make light of it: seemed as he neither heard nor saw them that spake vnto him. But euen at that very instant, as by diuine reuenge to crie quittance, there fell a great mishap vpon him. For before the Ambassadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bandes called the mothers, were slaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greatest losse that they in long time before had sustained. For they lost a great number of valiant soldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were slaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Agesilaus went straight into the field with hope to saue them, or at the least to be reuenged. But receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all slaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then comforted the Ambassadors of the BOEOTIANS, to giue them audience. But they, to requite his former disdaine vnto them, made no manner of speach of peace, but onely requested him to suffer them to enter into CORINTHE. Agesilaus being offended, aunswered them: if it be to see your friends triumphe of their victorie, yee may safely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambassadors with him, he destroied the CORINTHIANS country, euen to the walles of their citie. And when he had made the Ambassadors see, that the citizens of CORINTHE durst not come out into the field to defend their countrie: he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowne, which by flight had escaped: he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwaies remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, because the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) should not reioice at their losse. After this voiage, to gratifie the ACHAIANS, he entred in with them into the countrie of ACARNANIA, and brought great spoiles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battell. Moreouer, when the ACHAIANS besought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from sowing of their ground: he made them answer he would not. For, said he, they will be afraide of warre the next yeare, when all their fields shall be sowne with corne: & so indeed it came to passe. For the army returning againe they made peace incontinently with the ACHAINS. About that time, Pharnabazus & Conon, with the king of PERSIAES army, being Lords of the sea without let of any, destroyed and spoiled all the coast of LACONIA. Moreouer, the city of ATHENS did reare vp her wals again by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that ende sent Antalcidas Ambassadour vnto Tiribazus, most shamely and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whose libertie Agesilaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Agesilaus hap not to be foiled with any part of his shame: for Antalcidas that was his enemie, sought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he saw warre did daily increase the authoritie, honor, and fame of Agesilaus. Notwithstanding, he aunswered one then, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: no, said he, they do not so, but the MEDES do play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheles, threatning warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace: he compelled them to yeeld vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But surely he did this chiefly in respect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to set the country of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, should be so much the weaker. This plainly appeared soone after by that that followed. For Phœbidas hauing committed a fowle fact in open peace to take the castell of the citie of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending therby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themselues also not being very well pleased with it, the those specially which were Agesilaus enemies) Phœbidas being asked in great anger, at whose commandement he had done that so daine enterprise: to lay all the suspition of the fact vpon him: Agesilaus for Phœbidas discharge, letted not openly to say, that the qualitie of the fact was to be considered of, whether it were profitable for the common wealth or not: and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his country to do it of his own head without commandement. All this notwithstanding he was wont to say in priuate talke, that iustice was the chiefest of all vertues, and therfore that valiantnes without iustice was of no valuation, & that if all men were iust, valiantnes were of no estimation. And to them that told him, the great king will haue it so: Why, said he, and wherein is he better then my selfe, if he be not iuſter? Iudging very wiſely therein, that they ſhould eſteeme a king (whether he were of great or ſmall power) by his iuſtice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the king of PERSIA hauing ſent him a priuate letter deſiring his friendſhip, Ageſilaus refuſed it, ſaying: that common friendſhip was enough betwixt them, and that they ſhould neede none other, ſo long as that was kept. But this notwithſtanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his firſt good opinion, and gaue place to his will and ambition, ſpecially againſt the THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely ſaue Phœbidas, but alſo procured the citie of SPARTA to take the fault vpon them which he had committed, and to iuſtifie it, by keeping the caſtle of Cadmea ſtill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernors of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phœbidas came by the caſtel of Cadmea, and poſſeſſed it. Thereupon euery man thought ſtraight, that Phœbidas was he that had put the matter in execution, and that Ageſilaus gaue the counſell to do it: as things falling out afterwards, did manifeſtly proue the ſuſpition true. For, after that the THEBANS had driuen the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the caſtell of Cadmea, and reſtored their citie againe to libertie, burthening them that they had traiterouſly ſlaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were tyrants, though in name Gouernours) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus, raigning then king with him after Ageſipolis death, was ſent before into BOEOTIA with an armie. Ageſilaus was diſpenſed with by lawe for going any more to the warres, by reaſon of his age, for that he was fortie yeare olde from the firſt growth of haire on his face, and therefore went not that iorney: being aſhamed that the THEBANS ſhould now ſee him fight to reuenge the tyrants deaths, who had but a litle before taken armes for the baniſhed men, againſt the PHLIASIANS.

Sphodrias practiſe to take the hauen of Pirœa at Athens.

At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrarie faction vnto Ageſilaus: and was then gouernor in the citie of THESPIES, a valiant and ſtout man of his hands, but euer fuller of vaine hope, than of good iudgement. He deſiring fame, and ſuppoſing that Phœbidas came to dignitie and great eſtimation through his valiant enterpriſe at THEBES: perſuaded himſelfe that he ſhould win much more honor, if of himſelfe he tooke the hauen of Pirœa ſo dainly ſtealing vpon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by ſea. It was thought commonly that this was a practiſe deuiſed by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernors of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine men to faine themſelues very deuout & friendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe men praiſing and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none ſo worthie as himſelf alone, to take in hand ſo noble an enterpriſe. Thus by their perſuaſions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vilenes was nothing inferior vnto that tretcherous winning of the caſtell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leſſe hardineſſe & diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of Thriaſium, where he made account to haue bin at the walles of Pirœa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him ſeeing certaine fires from the temples of the citie of ELEVSIN, were all afraide & amazed: yea he himſelfe alſo fainted perceiuing he was diſcouered, & ſo returned back with ſhame & diſhonor to the city of THESPIA without any exploit done, ſauing only a litle ſpoile taken. Thereupon accuſers were ſtraight ſent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who vpon their arriuall found that they needed not to accuſe him, for that the councell and Gouernours of the citie had already ſent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of high treaſon. But he durſt not returne to SPARTA, fearing the furie of his countriemen, thinking indeed that they would ſeeme as though the wrong had bene done to them, becauſe it ſhould not be thought that they had cauſed it to be done. This Sphodrias had a ſonne called Cleonymus, a very faire boy, with whome Archidamus (Ageſilaus ſonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruelous ſorie to ſee this boy he loued, in ſo great danger to loſe his father, and yet durſt not be ſeene to helpe him, becauſe Sphodrias was one of Ageſilaus aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Ageſilaus (whom they feared aboue all men elſe.) Archidamus followed his father three or foure daies together, and durſt not breake the matter to him: in fine, the day of the next ſeſſion being at hand, when iudgement ſhould be giuen of Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had praied him to be an humble ſuter to him touching his fathers fact. Ageſilaus vnderſtanding that his ſonne loued

Cleonymus,

Cleonymus, would not withdrawe him from louing of him, becauſe the boy euen from his childhood gaue alwaies good hope that one day he would ſure make as honeſt a man as any other whatſoeuer: neither made he any countenance to his ſonne, as though he would do any thing at his ſute, but onely anſwered him, for that, he would do as became him in ſuch a caſe. Whereupon Archidamus being bashfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would ſee him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias friends deſpaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Ageſilaus familiars talking with them, tolde them that for the fact it ſelfe, Ageſilaus thought it a ſhamefull deede, and as much miſliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias ſelfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and ſaw that the commonwealth had need of men of ſuch ſeruice. This was Ageſilaus common talke to pleaſe his ſonne, when any man came to ſpeake to him of Sphrodias accuſation. Inſomuch that Cleonymus found ſtraight that Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be, and then Sphodrias friends alſo tooke heart againe vnto them, to ſolicite his cauſe, and to be earneſt ſuters for him.

Ageſilaus among other had this ſpeciall propertie, that he loued his children deerly: and a tale goeth on him, that he would play with them in his houſe when they were litle ones, and ride vpon a litle cocke horſe, or a reede, as a horſeback. Inſomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children: he praied him to ſay nothing, till he had litle children himſelfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his iudges. The ATHENIANS vnderſtanding it, ſent to proclaime warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Ageſilaus was much reproued, becauſe that to pleaſe the fonde affection of his ſonne, he had hindered iuſtice, and brought his citie to be accuſed among the GRÆCIANS for ſuch grieuous crimes. Ageſilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no very good will to make warre with the THEBANS, he breaking the order ſet downe for leading of the army, which was kept before, went to the warres himſelfe in perſon, and ſo inuading BOEOTIA he both reuenged and did great hurt. Wherupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, now truly (ſaid he) the THEBANS haue paide you your deſerued hire, for teaching them againſt their willes to be ſouldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For in deed they ſay the THEBANS became better ſouldiers and warriours than they were before, being daily trained & exerciſed in armes through the continual inuaſions of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Lo, this was the reaſon, why the olde father Lycurgus in his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make war too oft with one ſelfe people, becauſe that by compulſion they ſhould not be made expert ſoldiers. For this cauſe all the confederats of LACEDÆMON hate Ageſilaus, ſaying, that it was not for any knowne offence to the ſtate, but for very ſpight and priuate malice of his own, that he ſought to vndo the THEBANS in this maner: & that to follow his humor, they conſumed themſelues going yeare vnto the warres one while this way, an other while that way, without any neceſſitie at all, following a few LACEDÆMONIANS, themſelues being alwaies the greater number. Thē it was, that Ageſilaus deſiring to make thē ſee what number of men of war they were, vſed this deuiſe. One time he commanded all the allies to ſit downe together one with an other by themſelues, and the LACEDÆMONIANS alſo by themſelues. Then he made a herauld proclaime that all potmakers ſhould ſtand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made him crie to the braſiers to riſe alſo. After them in like maner, the carpenters: then the maſons, and ſo conſequently all occupations one after an other. So that at the length the confederats obeying the proclamation, were all in maner on their feete. The LACEDÆMONIANS, not one of them roſe: becauſe all baſe mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupie. Then Ageſilaus laughing at them, ſaid, my friends ſaid he: dō ye not ſee now that we bring moe ſouldiers to the field, than ye do? At his returne from this iourney of THEBES, paſſing by the city of MEGARA, as he went vp into the councell houſe within the caſtell, there ſodainly tooke him a great crampe in his left thigh, that ſwelled extreamly, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but bloud which had filled the vaine: a Phiſitian of SYRACVSA in SICILE being there, ſtraight opened a vaine vnder the ankle of his foote, which made the paine to ceaſe: notwithſtanding there came ſuch abundance of bloud, that they could not ſtanche it, ſo that he ſounded oft, and was in great danger of preſent death. In fine, a way was found to ſtop it, and they caried him to LACEDÆMON, where he lay ſicke a long time, ſo that he was paſt going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by sea and land, and among other, their greatest ouerthrow was at the battell of LEVCTRES, where the THEBANS ouercame and slue them in plaine battell. Then the GRECIANS were all of one minde to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambassadors and the Deputies from all the cities of GRECE, and met at LACEDÆMON to that ende. One of these Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philosopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He seeing how the other Ambassadors curried fauor with Agesilaus, only he of the rest kept his grauitie to speake freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRECE in generall, declaring to them all, how warres did only increase the greatnesse and power of the citie of SPARTA, and contrarily did minish and decay all other cities and townes of GRECE: and for this cause, that he did counsell them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all, to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Agesilaus perceiuing then that all the GRECIANS present at the assemblie gaue him good eare, and were glad to heare him speake thus boldly of peace: asked him openly, if he thought it mette and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set cleere at libertie againe? Epaminondas presently & boldly againe asked him: if he thought it iust and requisite to set all LACONIA cleere again at liberty. Agesilaus being offended therwith, stood vpon his feet, and commanded him to answer plainly whether they would set all BOEOTIA at libertie or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the self speach again, & asked him whether they would set al LACONIA at liberty or not? Then nettled Agesilaus so, that (besides he was glad of such a cloke, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS) he presently put the name of the THEBANS out of the bill of those, which should haue bene comprised within the league, and cried open warres vpon them in the market place. For the rest, he licensed the other Deputies & Ambassadors of the people of GRECE to depart, with this conclusion: that they should louingly take order among themselues for the controuersies betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together, & they that could not fall to such agreement, that then they should trie it by wars, for that it was a hard thing to take vp all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chaunce was at that time in the countrie of PHOCIDE with his armie, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he should forthwith spoile the THEBANS countrie: and therewith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fansie to the iorney, and were loth to make war with them, but yet durst not refuse to go, nor disobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many signes presaging ill luck, as we haue written in the life of Epaminondas, & that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this warre all that he could: Agesilaus would needs forward, hoping he had now found oportunitie to be reuenged of the THEBANS, sith all GRECE besides was in peace and at libertie, themselues onely exempted from treaties of peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very shortnesse of time, that made it manifest enough that this warre was begun in a geere, without any manner of reason. For the generall peace amongst the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDÆMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEVCTRES the fifteene of June: so as there was but twenty daies betwene them. There were slaine a thousand LACEDÆMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choisest of the valiantest SPARTANS about him. Amongst them was also slaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias sonne, of whom we spake before: who hauing bene beaten downe thrise at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was slaine, valiantly fighting against the THEBANS. This great ouerthrowe chancing to the LACEDÆMONIANS vnlooked for, and withall so glorious a victorie vnto the THEBANS, as GRECIANS fighting with GRECIANS had neuer the like: the vanished citie of SPARTA notwithstanding deserued no lesse honour and commendation for her fortitude and worthinesse, than did the victorious citie of THEBES. For as Xenophon writeth that as amongst good men euen in table talke, and in their sportes and mirth there falleth euer some thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen so in like case, no lesse, but rather more, ought noble mens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked as well in aduersitie as in prosperitie. At that time by chance there was a common feast day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of strangers that came to see the daunces and sportes of them that that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell lost at LEVCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor straight ranne all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had lost the signory and commaundement ouer all GREECE: would not suffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the city in any thing to change the forme of their feast, but sent vnto the parents to euery mans house, to let them vnderstand the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they them selues remaining still in the Theater to see the daunces and sportes continued, to iudge who caried the best games away. The next morning when euery man knew the number of them that were slaine, and of those also that were escaped: the parentes and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced an other. On the other side, the parents of them that scaped, kept their houses with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houses, for any matter of necessity: ye should see him looke so heauily and sad, that he durst not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Besides all this, euen amongest the women there was greater difference. For the mothers of them that kept their sons which came from the battell, were sad and sorrowfull, and spake not a word. Contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went friendly to visite one an other, to reioyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates beganne to forsake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victory, would inuade PELOPONNESVS: then they beganne to bee pricked in conscience about the oracles of the goddes, thinking that this misfortune came to their city, for that they had thrust out of the kingdom a man perfect in lims, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the gods to beware of that aboue all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valiantnes, and his authority was such thereby, that they did not only vse him in war, as their king and soueraigne Captaine: but in ciuill causes also wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduise. As they did, when they durst not punishe them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Tresantas, (being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houses and of greatest power within the city) least they should moue some sturre or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth. It is shame and reproch to giue them any wiues, and also to mary any of theirs. Whosoeuer meeteth them may lawfully strike them, and they must abide it, and not giue them a word againe. They are cõpelled to weare poore tattered cloth gowns patched with cloth of diuers colours: and worst of all, to shaue the one side of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamy they deserued, specially then standing in neede of a great number of men of warre: they referred them selues altogether vnto Agesilaus, to take such order in it as he thought good. But Agesilaus then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, said in open assembly at LACEDÆMON that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policy he kept the law inuiolate, and saued also the honor of those poore men: and withall, to put these youths againe in heart, being amazed with this feare, he led the army into the countrey of ARCADIA, and would giue no battell, but onely tooke a small city of the MANTINIANS, and foraged the country. This againe did a litle reuiue the city of SPARTA with some hope, to make that it should not vtterly despaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the countrey of LACONIA, with forty thousand footemen well armed, besides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoile: so that in all, there were about three score and tenne thousand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was well neare sixe hundred yeares sith the DORIANS possessed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time til then they neuer saw enemies in their country that durst inuade them: but then they sacked and burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuer of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto SPARTA, and no man durst come out to resist them. For Agesilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to go out to fight against such a tempest and fury of warre, but hauing fortified the middest of the city, and garded euery end of the streetes with souldiers, hee patiently bare all the bragges and threates of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bad him come into the field to defend his countrey, that only was the cause of all these their calamities, hauing him selfe procured this war. If this went to Agesilaus heart, no lesse grieuous were these troubles to him that rose within the city. As the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to see that they did before their eies: and of seely women also, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as straught of their wits, to heare the noise the enemies made, and to see the fire which they raised all the fieldes ouer. Much more sorrowfull also did this make him, when as he bethought him selfe, that entring into his kingdome at such time as the city of SPARTA was in the greatest prosperity that euer it was, he now saw his honor eclipsed, and the glory of his kingdome ouerthrowen: and the rather, for that him selfe had often aunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer seene the smoke of any enemies campe. And as they say of Antalcidas one day, that he answered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantnesse of one an others nation, alledging for himselfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driuen the LACEDÆMONIANS from the riuer of Cephisus. It is true, said the LACONIAN: but we did neuer driue you from the riuer of Eurotas. The like answer made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that cast him in the teeth, there are diuers of your LACONIANS buried in the countrey of ARGOLIDE: so are there none of yours, said he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did secretly send his children into the Ile of CITHÆRA, fearing least the city of SPARTA should be taken. Agesilaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to passe ouer the riuer, to enter the city: he stood to defend the middle part of the city, being the highest place of the same, and there had his men set in order of battell. Now at that time, by chaunce the riuer of Eurotas was swelled greater then of ordinary, by reason of the snow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldnes, then roughnes of the same, in passing it ouer. Some shewing Agesilaus how Epaminondas marched formost before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, saying neuer a word but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminondas hauing done all that he could possible to giue the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, euen within the city selfe of SPARTA, that he might there haue set vp some tokens of triumph, he could neuer intise Agesilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driuen in the end to depart thence, and so went to destroy all the rest of the country. There fell out a conspiracy of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the city where the temple of Diana stood, called Issorium, a place of strong situation, and ill to distresse. Hereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS in fury would straight haue set vpon them. But Agesilaus fearing great mutiny and stur vpon it: commaunded that no man should stur: and him selfe vnarmed, in a poore gown went thither, crying out to them that had taken that strength: Sirs, yee haue not obeied my commaundement. This is not the place I appointed you to assemble in, neither all of you in one place: for I willed you to disperse your selues, some one way, some an other way, shewing them the quarters of the city. The traitors hearing these words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and so leauing that strength, went into those partes of the city that he had shewed them. Agesilaus then bringing others thither, possessed the fort of Issorium, and tooke fifteene of those conspiratours, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out an other conspiracy farre greater then the first, of the SPARTANS them selues which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sodaine sturre and garboile, and to punish them in so great a trouble, it was hard: on the other side to neglect it, the conspiracy was ouer dangerous. Agesilaus hauing consulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any iudgement of law, neuer SPARTANS before them suffering death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuers of their neighbors, and of the Ilotes them selues, (whom they had billed in their bandes for souldiers) stale away, and ranne to their enemies, which did much discorage them that remained: he warned his men that they should euerie day goe to their couches where they lay, and that they should take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, because they should not know the names of them that were fled in this sort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, some say that they went out of LACONIA by reason reason of the winter that came on, whereuppon the ARCADIANS discharged their bandes, and euery one departed his way in disorder. Others also hold opinion, that they continued there three moneths together, during which time they destroyed the most part of the countrey. Theopompus writeth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, sent from Agesilaus, who brought them tenne talents that they should depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money giuen them to defray their charges homewardes, to doe that, which they them selues had long before determined to haue done. And yet doe I wonder, how it is possible that all other historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All doe acknowledge truely, that Agesilaus onely was the cause that the city of SPARTA was saued: who leauing his ambition and selfe will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safety. Neuertheless, after this great ouerthrow, hee could neuer raise SPARTA againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole body, which hauing acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfet presently, and so putteth all in daunger: euen so Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect state of gouernment in the common wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amity together: when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happy life: they were straight ouerthrowen and all went to wracke. By this time Agesilaus was growen olde, and could no more goe to the warres for very age: but his sonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionysius the tyraunt of SYRACVSA sent vnto them, wanne a battell against the ARCADIANS, called the teareless battell: for there died not one of his men, and they slue a great number of their enemies. This victory plainely shewed the great weakenesse and decay of the city of SPARTA. For in former times it was so common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did sacrifice nothing else to the goddes in token of thankes, within the city, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the battell made no boast of it: neither did they that heard the news reioice greatly at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the city of MANTINEA, which Thucydides describeth: the Ephori only sent the messenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then, when newes was brought of this victory, and that they vnderstoode Archidamus came home victorious: neither man nor woman could keepe the city, but the father him selfe went first of all to meete him, with the teares in his eies for ioy, and after him all the other Magistrates and officers of the city, and a swarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the riuers side, holding vp their handes to heauen, and thanking the goddes, as if their city had redeemed and recouered her shame and lost honour, and begunne now to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, some say, that the husbandes durst not boldly looke their wiues in the faces, they were so ashamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the city of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and replenished with people, he called home againe out of all partes, the naturall inhabitants of the same. The SPARTANS durst not fight with him (nor to hinder his purpose) though it spighted them to the hearts, and were angry with Agesilaus, for that in his raigne they had lost all that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA selfe, and that for goodnes and fertility compared with the best parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilaus would not agree to the peace, which the THEBANS sent to offer him: and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the enemies kept in deedes. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not only without recouering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the city of SPARTA by a warlike stratageme, in the which he was deceiued. For the MANTINIANS being newly reuolted again from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing sent for the LACEDAEMONIANS: Epaminondas receiuing intelligence that Agesilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aid the MANTINIANS, marched away secretly by night from TEGEA, without the priuity of the MANTINIANS; and went straight to SPARTA, the which he had almost surprised on the sodaine (going an other way then Agesilaus came, (being in manner without men to defend it. Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callisthenes sayeth, (or as Xenophon writeth, a CRETAN,) brought Ageſilaus newes of it: who diſpatched a horſeman ſtraight to aduertiſe them of the city of SPARTA, and marching forward him ſelfe to returne, ſtayed not long after before he arriued. He was no ſooner come, but incontinently alſo came the THEBANS, who paſſing ouer the riuer of Eurotas, gaue aſſault to the city. Then Ageſilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of ſecurity as before, but rather of deſperation and courage: he valiauntly defended it, more then an olde mans yeares could beare. Thus, through courage and deſperate minde, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euer vſe it, he put by the daunger, and ſaued the city of SPARTA from Epaminondas handes, ſetting vp markes of triumphe for repulſing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to ſee the LACEDÆMONIANS how honorably they rewarded their nurſe and countrey for their good education: but Archidamus chiefely of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulſe the enemies whereſoeuer the daunger was greateſt. It is ſayed alſo that at that time there was one Iſadas the ſonne of Phœbidas, that did maruellous ſtraunge things to behold, both in the face of his enemies, as alſo in the ſight of his friendes. He was of goodly perſonage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being ſtarke naked, and vnarmed, his body nointed with oyle, hauing in one hand a boreſtaffe, and in the other a ſword, in this manner he went out of his houſe, and ranne amongeſt them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withſtoode him, and was not once hurt, either for that the goddes preſerued him for his manhoodes ſake, or elſe becauſe men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honor and reward of his valiantneſſe: but withall they ſet a fine on his head to pay a thouſand ſiluer Drachmas for his raſhe attempt, to hazard him ſelfe, in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought an other great battell before the city of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowen the firſt rancks of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and coragiouſly diſtreſſing the reſt, valiantly following the chaſe: there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiuing him (as Dioſcorides writeth) ſlue him with his boreſpeare. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithſtanding, do call the offspring of this Anticrates, Macheriones: as much to ſay, as ſwordmen, as though he had ſlaine him with a ſword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did eſteeme this Anticrates ſo much, for that deadly ſtroke he gaue (becauſe they were afrayd of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that ſlue him, great honors and dignities, and diſcharged all his offspring and kindred from paiment of ſubſidy and common contributions, which priuiledge one Callicrates, a kinſeman of this Anticrates enioyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS hauing taken peace generally amongeſt them, Ageſilaus would needes exclude the MESSENIANS from being ſworne to this peace, ſaying: that they neede not ſweare, becauſe they had no city. Now, foraſmuch as all the GRECIANS elſe did receiue them as amongſt the number, and tooke their oth vnto this peace: the LACEDÆMONIANS brake off from this generall peace, and none but they only made war, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS country, and all through the allurement of Ageſilaus, who for this cauſe was thought of the GRECIANS cruell and vnſatiable man for warres, to deale ſo craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, hee brought him ſelfe in diſcredit with all men, being compelled to make his coffers bare of money, borrowing of them ſtill, and raiſing ſundry contributions amongeſt them: whereas in deede it had beene his beſt way to haue ended all thoſe miſeries, hauing ſo happy an occaſion offered at that time, and not to haue loſt ſo great an Empire of ſo many townes and cities, both by ſea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this moſt ſhame vnto him of all other, when he gaue himſelfe vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the EGYPTIANS, euery man thinking it a ſhametull part of him, that ſuch a perſonage as he (reputed the chiefeſt man of all the GRECIANS, and the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glory) ſhould for money let out his perſon to hire, and the glory of his name, vnto a barbarous perſon, a traitour and rebell to his king and maiſter, to become a mercenary Captaine and ſouldier to doe him ſeruice. And moreouer, he being now foure ſcore yeares of age and vpwardes, his body all mangled with woundes, though he had vndertaken this honourable charge for the recouery of the liberty of

of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserued some blame: for noble acts haue their time, neither the good and ill doe nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocrity. But Agesilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in seruice, specially for the profite of the common wealth, but perswaded him selfe that it was a dishonor to him to liue idly in a city and doe nothing, till death should come and make his summons: thereuppon forthwith he leuied men of warre through all GREECE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea, hauing thirty SPARTANS counsellers and assistants to him, as he had in his first iourney. Now Agesilaus being arriued in EGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and Gouernours of king Tachos came to the sea shore, and honourably receiued him: and not they only, but infinite numbers of EGYPTIANS of all sorts (that were maruellous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agesilaus) came thither from all partes to see what manner of man he was. But when they saw no stately traine about him, but an old gray-beard sitting on the grasse by the sea side, a litle man that looked simply of the matter, and but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored thred bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the very tale, that the mountaines should bring forth, and was deliuered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him presentes to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geese, and such grosse things: and refused all confections, perfumes and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to giue them to the women his slaues. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted maruellously in the rushe Papyrus, and liked the garlandes they made of them, for their finesse and the handsomnesse, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing spoken at that time with Tachos, who was assembling his army to goe on his iorney: hee was not made chiefetaine generall, as he looked he should haue bene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the straungers, Chabrias Generall of all the army by sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos himselfe in person. This at the first grieued Agesilaus to the heart, being driuen whether he would or no, to beare with the vanity and pride of this EGYPTIAN. So he sayled with him into PHENICIA, against the PHENICIANS, imbasing him selfe against his noble disposition and minde, and gaue him place, vntill he saw time of reuenge. It chaunced that one Nectanebos a nephewe of this Tachos, hauing the leading of part of this army, rebelled against him, and being chosen king by the EGYPTIANS, he sent vnto Agesilaus, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, and prayed him to ioyne with him, promising great rewardes vnto them both. Tachos vnderstanding that, besought them both that they would not forsake him. Chabrias for his part also did likewise intreate Agesilaus, and perswade him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agesilaus aunswered him, for thee, Chabrias, I am sure of thine owne good will, and therefore mayest doe what thou thinkest good: but take it not with me. For I am sent hither a Captaine by my countrey, to serue the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honesty for me to make warre with them, whom I am sent to succour and aide: were it not that they them selues which sent me, doe now commaund me the contrary. This aunswer being made, he sent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they also for their parts sent to intreate the councell of LACEDÆMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promising to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing heard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilaus should consider of his matter: and wrote secretly to him, that he should do what he thought best for the common wealth of SPARTA. So Agesilaus taking with him the mercenary souldiers which he had brought out of GREECE, went vnto Nectanebos, cloking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his countrey, to bewray the wicked thing: but in deede taking away the visard to benefite his countrey, they might by a better name rightly haue tearmed it treason. Howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS placing the chiefest point of honor, to consist in the benefit of their country: did acknowledge nothing to be iustice, but that which they thought might serue for the aduauncement of the glory of SPARTA. Tachos seeing him selfe forsaken thus by his mercenary straungers, fled. But now on the other side, there rose an other king in the city of MENDES, against this Nectanebos, who hauing leauied to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encorage Ageſilaus, told him, that in deede they were great number of men of all ſorts together, and ſpecially men of handy craft, and therefore they were not to be feared, becauſe they knew not what warre ment. But Ageſilaus answered him againe: it is not their number that I feare, but their rudeneſſe and vnskilfulneſſe, which is hardeſt of al to deceiue. For warlike ſtratagems doe moſt preuaile againſt men that have leſt feare and experience: and therefore they foreſee one thing rather then an other. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor haue forecaſt, and therefore do they him no more aduantage that ſeeketh to deceiue them, then the wraſtler by ſleight is able to ouerthrow him, whom he can not ſturre nor remoue. Afterwards the MENDESIAN king himſelfe ſent vnto Ageſilaus, to winne him if he could. Nectanebos then beganne to be afraid when Ageſilaus counſelled him to try it by battell as ſoone as he could, and not to prolong this warre againſt ignoraunt men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multitude might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuerſe things: then he beganne to doubt and ſuſpect him more, and thereupon retired into a great city well walled about, and of great ſtrength. Ageſilaus being offended that he miſtruſted him thus, tooke it inwardly: but being aſhamed to turne againe vnto the third, and alſo to depart without any exploite done, he followed him, and encloſed him ſelfe within thoſe walles. The enemies purſuing him hard, came vnto the city, and beganne to entrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN king Nectanebos fearing a long ſiege, determined to giue them battell. Thereto the hired GRECIANS gaue conſent, as deſiring no better match, and the rather alſo for that there was but ſmall ſtore of corne within the city. But Ageſilaus perſwading the contrary, would in no wiſe conſent to it: whereuppon the EGYPTIANS thought worſe of him then before, and plainely called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all their accuſations, expecting time to performe an exploite he entended, which was this. The enemies had caſt a deepe trench without to compaſſe them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both endes lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commaunded the GRECIANS arme, and to put them ſelues in readineſſe: then he came vnto the EGYPTIAN, and ſayd vnto him. Lo here is an excellent occaſion preſented to ſaue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall til I ſaw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing leaſt otherwiſe we might haue loſt it. Now ſith the enemies them ſelues haue with their owne handes giuen vs the means to ſaue our ſelues by this trench they haue caſt, the which as much as is finiſhed thereof doth hinder their great multitude to helpe them ſelues, and that which is yet left vnfiniſhed doth giue vs oportunity to fight with them of euen hand: determine to ſhew thy valure, and following vs, ſaue thy ſelfe and thy people. For the enemies which we ſhall aſſaile before vs, shall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trenche which defendeth vs on either ſide, can no way hurt vs. Nectanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great wiſdome, and ſo thruſting in among the GRECIANS, did aſſaile the enemies: the which were ſoone caſt and thrown and put to flight, as many as durſt reſiſt and make head againſt them. Ageſilaus hauing wonne Nectanebos againe to truſt him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like ſubtilty wherewith he had firſt beguiled them, and which they knew not how to auoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and intiſed them to follow him: ſodainely againe he would turne this way and that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a ſtrait ſluce, walled about of either ſide, with great broad ditches full of running water: ſo that when they were euen in the middeſt of it, he ſodainely ſtopped their paſſage with the front of his battell, which he caſt to the breadth of the ſluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neither compaſſe him in behinde nor flanke him on the ſides. They hauing in this ſort made ſome ſmall reſiſtaunce, in the end turned their backes and fled, and left a great number ſlaine in the field: the reſidue after this ouerthrow forſooke their Captains, and fled ſtraglingly here and there. Thus the affairs of the EGYPTIAN king after that time had good ſucces, and was quietly ſtabliſhed in his kingdome, making much of Ageſilaus: and doing him all honour poſſible, prayed him to tary with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needes haſten home to his countrey, which was at warre with others, knowing that his city of SPARTA was without money, becauſe they were driuen to giue pay vnto ſtrangers. Thereupon Nectanebos in the end tooke his leaue of him very honorably, preſenting him a gift (beſides all other honors he did him) of two hundred and thirtie ſiluer talents in readie mony, to defray the charges of the warre in his country. Howbeit the ſea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithſtanding recouered land with his ſhips in a deſert place of the coaſt of LYBIA, which was called the haven of Menelaus, after he was foureſcore and foure yeare old: of the which he had raigned one and forty yeares king of SPARTA, and thirtie yeares thereof and more he was alwaies taken and reputed for the greateſt perſon, and in manner Chiefetaine generall of all GREECE, vnto the battell of LEVCTRES. Now the LACEDEMONIANS hauing a cuſtome to burie the dead bodies of their citizens that died out of their country, in the ſame place where they deceaſed: (the bodies of their kings excepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Ageſilaus, annointed his bodie with waxe for lacke of honny, and caried him home to SPARTA in this manner. His ſonne Archidamus ſucceeded him in the kingdome, whoſe iſſue ſucceſſiuely raigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the fifth king in ſucceſſion after Ageſilaus) whom in deede Leonidas put to death, becauſe he ſought to reſtore the LACEDEMONIANS ancient diſcipline and forme of life.

THE LIFE OF Pompey.

THE ROMAINS ſeeme to haue loued Pompey from his childhood, with the ſelfe affection that Prometheus in the tragedy of AEſchylus appeareth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him: when he ſaied,

So great a hate I bare not to the father, But that I loue the ſonne of him much rather.

The father of Pompey hated in Rome.

For the ROMAINS neuer ſhewed more bitter hate againſt any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truly ſo long as he liued, they feared his greatneſſe obtained by armes, for in deede he was a noble Captaine: but being ſtriken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his bodie lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie.

Strabo, the father of Pompey

The loue of the Romaines vnto Pompey.

Contrariwise, neuer any other ROMAINE (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest goodwill soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersity continued longer constant, than vnto Pompey. Only cause procured the fathers hate, and that was: an vnsatiable and greedy desire of mo But Pompey his sonne, was for many occasions beloued. As, for temperance of life, ap to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnes of word, and curtesie in conuersation: so that there was neuer man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and tooke with honor. Furthermore, being but a childe, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan good willes before he spake: for his countenance was sweete, mixed with grauitie, and be come to mans state, there appeared in his gesture and behauiour a graue and princely matc His haire also stoode a litle vpright, and the cast and soft mouing of his eyes, had a cert resemblance (as they said) of the statues and images of king Alexander. And because ci man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it himselfe: insomuch as there were some wh spottingwise did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucius Philippus a Consull, wa ashamed to say openly in an oratiō he made in Pompeys fauour, that it was no maruell if h ing Philip, did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtisan waxed old, much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompey being a young m telling that after she had lyen with him, she could not possiblie rise from him, but she m needes giue him some sweete quippe or pleasannt taunte. She would tell also howe one Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her, & was a maruello earnest suter to obtaine her goodwill: and that she aunswered him flatly, she would not, the loue she bare to Pompey. Geminius thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himselfe. P pey desirous to pleasure him, graunted the request: howbeit Geminius after that, would come neere Flora, nor speake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora this not curtisan like, for she was sick a long time for very griefe of minde, and the thought tooke vpon it. All this notwithstanding, it is said that this Flora had then such fame for passing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus setting foorth and beautifying the te Castor and Pollux, with goodly tables and pictures: among the rest, he caused her pi be liuely drawne for her excellent beautie. Furthermore Pompey, against his nature, dea hardly and vncourteously with the wife of Demetrius, his franchised bondeman (who he liued was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thousand talents) to be taken with her beautie which was very singularlie faire, least he should be thou loue with her. Now, though herein he seemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the yet could he not thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill willers: for they did acc that to please and content his wiues, he would let passe and winke at many things, against the profite of the common wealth? To proue his sober and temperate diet, a he was contented with common meates: a word (they say) he spake when he was ve and could tast no meate, is specially noted. For, to bring his stomacke to him againe, h sitian willed him to eate a thrushe. So seeking all about to get him one, there was no to be bought for money, for they were out of season. Notwithstanding, one told him should not misse of them at Lucullus house, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. what then, sayed he: if Lucullus ryot were not, should not Pompey liue? Therewithall, his Phisitians counsell alone, he made them dresse such meate as was euery where But of that we will speake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in th with his father, that was in armes against Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a com of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promised Cinna to k and other confederators also had promised to set their Captaines tent a fire. This co was reuealed vnto Pompey as he sate at supper, which nothing amated him at all but he freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time, he of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his safety. Terentius thi hower come to attempt his enterprise, rose with his sword in his hand, and went to bed where he was wont to lie, and gaue many a thrust into the matteresse. After he that all the campe ſtraight was in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the ſouldiers in all haſte would needes haue gone and yeelded to their enemie, beginning already to ouerthrowe their tentes, and to truſſe away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durſt not come out of his tent: notwithſtanding Pompey his ſonne ranne amongſt the mutinous ſouldiers, and humbly beſought them with the teares in his eyes, not to doe their Captaine this villanie, and in fine threwe himſelfe flatling to the ground ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them march ouer him, if they had ſuch a deſire to be gone. The ſouldiers being aſhamed of their follie, returned againe to their lodging, and chaunging minde, reconciled themſelues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the worlde, Pompey being his heire, was accuſed for the father, to robbe the common treaſure. Howbeit he confeſſed and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchiſed bondmen that had ſtolen the moſt part of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithſtanding, he was accuſed himſelfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cordes of huntſmennes, and bookes that were taken at Aſculum. He confeſſed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had loſt them ſince, when Cinna returned vnto ROME with his ſouldiers, who breaking into his houſe by force, ſpoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitiue ſentence, in which time Pompey ſhewed himſelfe of good ſpirite and vnderſtanding, more then was looked for in one of his yeares: inſomuch he wanne ſuch fame and fauor by it, that Antiſtius being Prætor at that time, and iudge of his matter, fell into ſuch a liking with him, that ſecretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, & the parties were ſecretly aſſured. This was not ſo cloſely conueyed, but the people perceiued it, by the care and paines Antiſtius tooke to fauour his matter. Inſomuch, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, and cleered him: all the people together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voice, Talaſſio, Talaſſio, being the vſuall and common crie they vſed of olde time at mariages in ROME. This cuſtome by reporte of auncient folke came vp in this manner. At what time the chiefeſt peeres and Lordes of ROME did raviſh the SABINES daughters, which came to ROME to ſee common ſportes plaied: there chanced a fewe raſcalles (as hoggeheards or neatheards) to cary away a goodly faire woman. They fearing ſhe ſhould be taken from them, cried out in the ſtreetes as they went, Talaſſio, as if they would haue ſaid, ſhe is for Tallaſſius. This Tallaſſius was a young gentleman well knowne, and beloued of moſt men: ſo that ſuch as heard him but named onely, did clap their hands for ioy, and cried out with them, Talaſſio, commending the choice they had made of him. So, hereof they ſay came this cuſtome, that euer ſince they haue cried this worde Talaſſio vnto them that are newly maried, becauſe the mariage of that faire young maide proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talaſſius. And this me thinkes ſoundeth neareſt to the troth of that they report of this wedding crie of Talaſſio. Shortly after this iudgement giuen, Pompey married Antiſtia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accuſed him for ſomething, whereupon he being afraied, ſecretly ſtale away. Now when they could not finde him in Cinnaes campe, there ran ſtraight a rumor abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Therevpon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did ſet vppon him for this occaſion. But he thinking to ſaue him ſelfe by flying, was ſtraight ouertaken by a priuate Captaine that followed him with his ſword drawen in his hand. Cinna ſeeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his ſeale from his finger wherewith hee ſealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tuſh, ſayed the Captaine, I come not to ſeale any couenaunt, but to chaſtiſe a villaine and cruell tyraunt: and therewithall thruſt his ſword through him, and ſlue him preſently. Cinna being ſlaine in this ſort, Carbo ſucceeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hand, being a more cruell tyraunt then the firſt. Shortly after came in Sylla, long wiſhed for, and deſired of the moſt part of the ROMAINES, for the grieuous oppreſſions and miſeries they endured, that they thought them ſelues happy to change Gouernour: for their city was brought into ſuch miſery, as hoping no more to ſee ROME recouer her loſt liberty, they deſired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALY called PICENVM (now the marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more, great loue and good will of the cities for his fathers sake. He seeing that the noblest men of ROME forsooke their houses and goods, to flie from all partes vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of safetie: would not goe to him as a fugitiue and cast away to saue himselfe, without bringing him some power to increase his army, but would honorably goe thither with an armie, as he that ment first to doe himselfe pleasure. So he felt the good will of the PICENTINES, who willingly tooke his part, and reiected them that were sent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said: that Pompey which came from schoole the last day, must now in haste be a Captaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time, Pompey being but three and twentie yeare olde, tarying to receiue no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him himself, and causing a tribunall to be set vp in the midst of the market place of AVXIMVM, a great populous city: he commanded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefest men of the citie, and they that for Carboes sake withstoode his doings) without delay foorthwith to auoide the citie, and so beganne to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, sergeantes of bandes, Centeniers, and such other officers as appertaine to martiall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the same marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the rest willingly yeelded vnto him: whereby in shorte space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, cartes, and all manner of beasts for cariage. In this sort he tooke his iourney towards Sylla, not in hast, as a man affraide to be met with by the way, but by small iourneys, staying still where he might hurt his enemy, causing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuertheless, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Cælius, and Brutus, all three did set vpon Pompey together, not all in a fronte, nor of one side, but in three seuerall places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him sure at the first onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, hauing placed his horsemen (among the which he was himselfe in person) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were GAVLES, comming to giue charge vpon him, he ranne one of the chiefest among them through with his launce, and slue him. The other GAVLES seeing him slaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: so that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themselues, and some fled one way, some an other way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare: came all in to Pompey, and yeelded themselues. Afterwards Scipio the Consull comming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner ready to ioyne: before they came to throwing of their dartes, Scipioes souldiers saluted Pompeys men, and went on their side. So was Scipio driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo him selfe hauing sent after him diuerse troups of horsemen by the riuer of Arsis: Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assaile them, that he draue them into such places, as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon, they seeing no way to scape, yeelded them selues, horse and armour, all to his mercy. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone as he vnderstoode of it, fearing least Pompey should miscary, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies, he made hast to march towardes him for to aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approach, commaunded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might see them brauely appointed when he should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honor, and in deed he did him more honor, then Pompey looked for. For, when Sylla saw him a farre off comming towardes him, and his army marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly men, that so brauely aduaunced them selues, being couragious for the victory they had obtained of their enemies: hee lighted a foote. When Pompey also came to doe his duety to him, and called him Imperator: (as much as Emperour, or soueraigne Prince) Sylla resaluted him with the selfe name, beyonde all mens expectation present, litle thinking that he would haue giuen so honourable a name, vnto so yong a man as Pompey, who had not yet bene Senator: considering that he him selfe did contend for that title title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was answerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rise and put off his cappe to him, which he did not vnto many other noble mē about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in him selfe. Wherfore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into GAVLE, becausse Metellus that was there, was thought to haue done no exploit worthy of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than himselfe. Yet if Metellus of himselfe were contented, and would intreate him: that he would willingly goe and helpe him to ende this warre. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE did of himselfe wonderfull exploites, and did so reuiue Metellus old courage and valiantnesse to fight, which now beganne to faint, like boyling copper that being poured vpon the colde and hard copper, doth melt and dissolue it, as fast or faster, than fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath bene counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne the prize away where he hath wrestled, they neuer recorde among them his childish victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: euen so I am affraide to speake of the wonderfull deedes that Pompey did in his childhoode, becausse they are obscured in respect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had wonne afterwards. For I am affrad that whilest I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe ouer his chiefest actes and most notable enterprises, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had ouercome all ITALIE, and was proclaimed Dictator: he did rewarde all his Lieutenants and Captaines that had taken his parte, and did aduance them to honorable place and dignity in the commonwealth, franckly granting them all that they requested of him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valiantnes, and thinking that he would be a great stay to him in all his warres: he sought by some meanes to allie him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to marrie Æmylia the daughter of Metella, and of her first husband, the which also was an other mans wife, and with childe by her husband. These mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys nature and condition: to see Æmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to marie her great with childe, and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husband that did put her away. For Antistius was murthered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take parte with Sylla for his sonne in lawe Pompeys sake: and her mother voluntarily put her selfe to death, seeing her daughter receiued such open wrong. By these apparant causes, these vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miserable tragedie, by meanes of the death of AEmylia, who shortly after miserably died with childe in Pompeys house. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Iland at his deuotion, as a safe place to receiue all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo also kept the sea thereaboutes with a certaine number of shippes: that Domitius also was gone into AFRICKE: and diuers other noble men that were banished, that had scaped his proscriptions and outlawryes, were all in those partes. Against them was Pompey sent with a great army. Howbeit he no sooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole Iland, and went his way. There he fauorably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and misery, and set them againe at liberty, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the city of MESSINA. They despising his tribunall and iurisdiction, alledged the auncient order and priuiledge of the ROMAINS, set downe in times past amongst them. But Pompey aunswered them in choller: what doe ye prattle to vs of your law, that haue our swords by our sides? It seemeth also that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his misery. For sith he must needes die, as there was no remedy but he should: then it had bene better they had killed him when he was taken. For then they would haue imputed it to his malice, that so had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to bee brought before him that had bene thrise Consull at ROME to be openly examined, and he sitting in his chaire of state or tribunall condemned him to die in presence of them all: to the great offence and misliking of euery one that was present. So Pompey bad them take him away, and carie him to execution.

The death of Carbo.

When Carbo came to the scaffold where he should be executed, and seeing the sword drawne that should strike off his head: he praied the executioners to giue him a litle respit and place to vntrusse a point, for he had a paine in his bellie. Caius Oppius also (one of Iulius Cæsars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, said he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and fewe like vnto him, when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him a side, and walked a fewe turnes about: then when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commaunded his guard to carie him away, and to dispatche him. Howbeit we may not giue too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, speaking of Iulius Cæsars friends or foes. For Pompey in deed was compelled to make away the greatest personages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken: but for the rest, all those that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was contented to winke at it, and would not vnderstand it: and moreouer did helpe some better to saue themselues. Nowe Pompey was determined to haue taken sharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had stoutly taken the enemies part. But Sthenis, one of the Gouernours of the citie, craued audience of Pompey, tolde him he should do them wrong and iniustice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durst take vpon him to father the offence of them all. Sthenis aunswered straight, that it was himselfe that had perswaded his friends, and compelled his enemies to do that which they did. Pompey being pleased to heare the franke speech and boldnesse of this man, first forgaue him the fault he had committed, and consequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderstanding that his souldiers did kill diuers men in the high wayes, he sealed vp all their swords, and whose seale soeuer was broken he was well fauoredly punished. Pompey being busie about these matters in SICILE, receiued letters & commission from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into AFRICK, to make warre vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leauied already more men of warre than Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICKE into ITALIE: & had there ouerthrowne all the ROMAINES doings, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyrant. Pompey thereupon hauing speedily put himselfe in readinesse to take the seas, left Memmius his sisters husband Gouernor of SICILE: and so himselfe imbarked, & hoised saile with six score gallies, and eight hundred other shippes or bottomes, to transport their victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatsoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleete, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE: there straight came to him seuen thousand soldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themselues; besides seauen whole legions that he brought with him. They say moreouer, that at his arriuall, he had a pleasant chance happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his souldiers stumbled on a treasure by chance, and got thereby a great masse of money. The residue of the armie hearing that, thought sure that the field where this treasure was found, was full of golde and siluer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, could haue no rule of his souldiers, neither could he choose but laugh, to see so many thousand men digging the grounde, and turning vp the fielde: vntil in the ende they wearied themselues, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their follie. Domitius came to Pompey with his armie set in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quamire before him that ran with a swift running streame, verie ill to get ouer: besides that, from the verie breake of day it had poured downe and rained so fast, and was so great a winde withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they should not fight, commaunded his people to trusse away, and remoue. Pompey on the other side, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, sodainly made his men to marche, and passed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order: were maruelously amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made resistance. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly set in battell ray, and had besides the winde beating the raine full in their faces. So did the storme much hurt vnto the ROMAINES also, for they could not one see an other: insomuch as Pompey himselfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his owne owne ſouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the worde of the battell, and was ſomewhat long before he anſwered him. In fine when he had ouerthrown his enemies with great ſlaughter: (for they ſay, that of twenty thouſand of them, there were but three thouſand ſaued) Pompeyes ſouldiers ſaluted him by the name of Imperator. But he anſwered them, that he would not accept the honour of that name, ſo long as he ſaw his enemies campe yet ſtanding: and therefore, if it were ſo they thought him worthy of that name, that firſt they ſhould ouerthrow the trench and fort of the enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The ſouldiers when they heard him ſay ſo, went preſently to aſſault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to auoide the like daunger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the campe by force, and in it ſlue Domitius. After that ouerthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded them ſelues, ſome willingly, and others taken by force: as alſo they tooke king Iarbas, that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was giuen to Hiempſall. But Pompey, being deſirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his army, went many daies iourney into the maine land, and ſtill conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMAINS dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that countrey, the which made but ſmall account of them at that time. He ſayed moreouer, that the wilde beaſtes of AFRICKE alſo ſhould feele the force and good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINES: and thereupon he beſtowed a few daies in hunting of Lions and Elephantes. For it is reported, that in forty daies ſpace at the vttermoſt, he had ouercome his enemies, ſubdued AFRICKE, and had eſtabliſhed the affaires of the kings and kingdoms of all that countrey, being then but foure and twenty yeare old. So when he returned vnto the city of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to diſcharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion only, tarying the comming of an other Captaine that ſhould be ſent to ſucceede him in the gouernment of that countrey. This commaundement, grieued him not a litle, though he made no ſhew of it at all: but his ſouldiers ſhewed plainely that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to giue out broad ſpeeches againſt Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatſoeuer became of them) to forſake him, & they would not that he ſhould truſt vnto tyrant. Pompey ſeeing that he could not perſwade them, by any reaſon to be quiet, roſe out of his chaire, and retired into his tent weeping. But the ſouldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of ſtate, where he ſpent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and commaund them, and he deſiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, ſeeing them importunate to preſſe him to it, he ſware he would kill himſelfe, rather then they ſhould compell him: yet they ſcant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled againſt him. Sylla when he heard that, ſaied to his friends: well, then I ſee it is my deſtiny, in mine olde daies to fight with children. He meant ſo, becauſe of Marius the younger, who had done him much miſchiefe, and had beſides put him in great danger. But afterwards vnderſtanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to goe and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honour they could: becauſe he would goe beyond them all in ſhew of good will, he went out of his houſe to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to ſay great, and commaunded all them that were preſent to giue him that name alſo. This notwithſtanding, ſome ſay, that it was in AFRICKE this name was firſt giuen him by a common crie of al his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. In deed it is true that Pompey himſelf being ſent Proconſull into SPAINE, long time after that, was the laſt that ſubſcribed all his letters and commiſſions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was ſo commonly knowen and accepted, as no man did enuy it. And therefore rightly is the wiſedome of the ancient ROMAINS, to be both commended & had in admiration: which did not only reward ſeruice in the field with ſuch honorable names and titles, but ciuil ſeruice and good gouernment alſo in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at ROME called Maximi, to ſay, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchiſed, who through their riches and fauor had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honor of triumphe, but Sylla denied it, alleaging that none could enter in triumph into ROME, but consulles or Prætors. For sith Scipio the first who in SPAINE had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer desired this honour of triumphe, being neither Consull nor Prætor: much lesse should he stand vpon demaund of triumph into ROME, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and besides, it would purchase him enuie of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla aleadge against Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to stand in it, he would resist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the rising, not the setting of the sunne: meaning therby, how his owne honor encreased, and Syllaes diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he sayed, but perceiuing by their countenances that stoode by, that they wondered at it, he asked what it was he sayed. When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnes of so young a man, and then cryed out twise together, let him then triumph a goddes name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, woulde needes be brought in in triumphant charriot drawen with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those kings and princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the citie being too narrow, he was driuen to leaue the Elephantes, and was contented to be drawen in with horses. Now his souldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumphe: he sayed he passed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called Seruilius, who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeyes triumph, who sayd openly: now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserueth triumph: being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue easily bene made Senator: he sued not for that, but as they say, sought honor by a stranger mean lesse honorable. For if he had bene made Senator, so young, it had not bene so great a matter: but to haue such honor before he was Senator, that was maruellously to be noted. But this wan him the more fauour and good will still amongst the common people: for they were glad when after his triumph they saw him in companie amongst the ROMAIN Knights. On the other side it spighted Sylla to see him come so fast forward, and to rise to so great credit: notwithstanding, being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keep it to himselfe, vntill that Pompey by force & against Syllaes will, had brought Lepidus to be Consull, by the helpe & good will of the people that furthered his desire. Thereuppon Sylla seing Pompey returning ouerthwarte the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honor him, he sayd vnto him: ô young man, I see thou art glad of this victory, and so hast thou cause, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had such fauor of the people, as for thy sake to haue made Lepidus Consull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the citie. But I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleep not, and looke well to thy busines, for thou hast aduanced a dangerous enemie to thy selfe. Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discouered most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last will and testament: for he gaue legacies vnto euery one of his friendes, and some of them he made tutors and ouerseers of his son, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding, Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would haue kept Syllaes body from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funeralles should not be openly solemnized: he contrariwise brought him very honorably and safely to the ground. Shortly after Syllaes death, his wordes of prophecy vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vsurping the authoritie which Sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred straight in armes, sturring vp againe those of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be reuenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, spying for occasion to rise againe. True it is that his colleague, and fellow Consull Catulus (whom the best and soundest part of the people followed) was thought a maruellous honest man, both iust and modest: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, insomuch as time required Pompeyes skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose himselfe, but tooke part straight with the nobility and honestest men, and was presently chosen Captain of their army against Lepidus: who had already wonne the greatest parte of ITALIE, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this side the mountaines called GALLIA CISAL-

PINA. And for the reſt Pompey eaſily ouercame it, howbeit he lay a long time before Modon, beſieging of Brutus. In the meane ſeaſon Lepidus came to ROME, & being hard at the wals demanding the ſecond Conſulſhip, made them afrayed in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all ſortes. Howbeit this feare was cooled ſtraight, by a letter which Pompey ſent to ROME, aduertiſing how he had ended this warre without any bloodſhed: for Brutus, either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeelded himſelfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certen number of horſemen that conducted him vnto a ſtrong towne vpon the riuer of Poe: where the next day after, Geminius being ſent by Pompey, ſlew him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written letters to the Senate from the beginning of the chaunge, how Brutus had put himſelfe into his handes: and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting of him to death. This Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwardes by the helpe of Caſſius ſlue Iulius Cæſar: howbeit he ſhewed not himſelfe ſo like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did. As we haue declared more at large in his life. Furthermore Lepidus, being driuen to forſake ITALIE, fled into SARDINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ſickneſſe that he had, not for any ſorrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his hart, knowing therby that his wife had played the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAYNE, who was another maner of warrier then Lepidus, & that kept the ROMAINS in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late ciuill warres were fled to him as from the laſt diſeaſe of the warres. He had already ouerthrowen many inferior Captaines, & was now wreſtling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble ſoldier, but now being old, made warres but ſlowly, and would not coragiouſly take preſent occaſions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimblenes and dexterity tooke out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought leaſt of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of ſouldiers, and would ſtill lay ambuſhes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell raye, his men being heauie armed. Hereupon Pompey keping his army alway together, practiſed at ROME, that he might be ſent into SPAIN to aide Metellus. But Catulus, notwithſtanding that he commanded him to diſperſe his armie, Pompey ſtill kept them together by colour of new deuiſes, & was continually about ROME in armes, vntill that by Lucius Philippus means he had obtained the gouernment of that coũtry. They ſay that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: how now Philip, doeſt thou then think it meet to ſend Pompey Proconſhill (to ſay, for a Conſull) into SPAINE? no truly ſayed Philip, not Proconſull onely, but Pro conſulibus: (to ſay, for both Conſulles) meaning, that both the Conſulles for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was ariued in SPAINE, men begã ſtraight to be caried away, (as the maner is commonly where new gouernors be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter wordes againſt Pompey, ſaying in mockery, he would haue no other weapon but roddes to whippe this young boy, if he were not afrayed of this olde woman: meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithſtanding theſe gallant bragges, he ſtood better vpon his gard, and went ſtronger to fight than he did before, being afrayed of Pompey. For Metellus was very diſſolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was giuen ouer too much to ryot and pleaſure: howbeit they ſaw in him a maruellous ſodaine change both of his honor and glory which he vſed before, as alſo the cutting off of his ſuperfluous expence. That thing, beſides that he did honour Pompey greatly by, wan him alſo much more the goodwill of the people, when they ſaw that he drew himſelfe downe to a ſtraighter life. And this was no great paine to him for of his owne diſpoſition he was a graue man, and temperatly giuen for his deſires. In this warre fortune changed diuerſly, as it is commonly ſene in warres: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON. For he thinking to haue ſhut him in, & had giuen out ſome glorious words of the matter: wondered when he ſaw himſelfe ſtraight compaſſed in, that he could not ſtirre out of the campe where he laye, and was driuen beſides to ſe the citie burnt before his face. This notwithſtanding, afterwards at a ſet battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he ſlue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable ſouldiers and Sertorius Lieutenantes, and with them ten thousand men. This victory so encoraged Pompey, that he made hast to fight with Sertorius alone, becaus Metellus should haue no part of the honor of the victory. So they both met by the riuer of Sucron, about sunne set, both fearing Metellus comming: the one that he might fight alone, & the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betwene the two Captaines, Sertorius had the greater honour: for he alone ouercame all them that stoode before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being on foot, came and set vpon him, & hauing both their swordes in their handes, they both lighted vpon their handes, but not both in one sort: for Pompeyes hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompeyes men fell vpon him, all his own fellowes on that side being fled from him: notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he saued himselfe after a strange sorte, by casting vp his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnes, hauing a capatison of great value: and in the meane time, while they were busie deuiding this booty among them, and fighting for it: he escaped their handes. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bandes into the field, to confirme the victory, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time, whereupon Sertorius went his way, and dispersed his army: for his campe was easily broken, & sodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would sometime wander the fieldes alone, and at another time againe he would haue a hundreth and fifty thousand fighting men together in the fielde, like a vehement streame that sometime is dried vp, and that sodainly againe is all of a flood. Pompey after this battell going to welcome Metellus, when they came neere one another, he commaunded his sergeantes and officers to put downe their bundell of roddes and axes which they carried before him to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man than himselfe. But Metellus would not suffer them, but shewed himselfe equall with him in that, and in all things else, not respecting his seniority, nor that he had bene Consull, and Pompey not, sauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watchword to all the campe. Notwithstanding, commonly they camped asunder, for their enemy that was so flitting from place to place, and was seene in so sundry places in so short time, compelled them to be a sunder to foresee the worst, drawing them sodainly from one purpose to another: so that in fine, cutting them off from victuals euery way, spoyling their country, and keping the sea side, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAYNE, and did compell them to goe some other where, for lacke of victuals. Pompey in the meane time hauing spent the most part of his goods in this warre, sent to ROME for money to pay his souldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they sent him no money, he woulde returne with his armie into ITALIE. Lucullus then being Consull, though Pompeyes enemy, procured they should send him money: for he practised to be sent Captaine against king Mithridates, and therfore was afrayed to giue Pompey any occasion to returne, who desired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius, to bend his force against Mithridates, whose ouerthrow should be more honorable to him, and also lesse dangerous. In the meane space, Sertorius died, being betrayed by those whom he thought his friendes, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needes counterfeate his doings, hauing the same meanes, the same furniture, and the same power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching diuidly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affayres: he layed a bayte for him of ten cohorts which he sent to prey in the fieldes, commanding them to disperse themselues abroade as farre as they could, one from another. Perpenna straight tooke the occasion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chase. But Pompey tarying him at the ford, was readie for him with all his armie set in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victory, and ended all this warre, becaus the most of the Captaines were slaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe of all taken prisoner, whom he presently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as some do burden him) of Perpennaes frendship shewed him in SICILIA, but rather deserued praise to haue determined so wisely for the benefit of the common wealth. For Perpenna hauing in his custody all Sertorius writings, he shewed letters of the greatest noblemen of ROME, (which were desirous of change of gouernment) willing him him to returne into ITALIE. Pompey vpon sight of these letters, fearing least they would breed greater sedition & stur in ROME, then that which was already pacified: put Perpenna to death as soone as he could, and burnt all his papers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in SPAINE a certaine time, till he had pacified all commotions and tumultes maruellously out of order: he brought his armie backe againe into ITALIE, and arriued there when the warre of the bondmen and fensers led by Spartacus, was in greatest furie. Vpon his comming therefore, Crassus being sent Captaine against these bondmen, made haste to giue them battell, which he wan, and slue twelue thousand, three hundreth of these fugitiues. Notwithstanding, fortune meaning to giue Pompey some part of this honor, fiue thousand of these bondmen escaping from the battell, fell into his hands. Whereupon he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate that Crassus had ouercome the fensers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this war by the rootes. The ROMAINS receiuing Pompeyes letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAINE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in sporte, that euer gaue any man else the honor, but vnto Pompey only. For all this great honor and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did suspect him, and were afrayed of him, because he did not disperse his army, that he would follow Syllaes steppes, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereuppon as many went to meet him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspition quite out of their heads, telling them that he woulde discharge his armie after he had triumphed: then his ill willers could blame him for nothing else, but that he was more enclined vnto the people then to the nobilitie, and that he had a desire to restore the Tribuneship of the people which Sylla had put downe, onely to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the common people at ROME neuer longed for thing more, than they did to see the office of the Tribune sette vp againe. Yea, Pompey himselfe thought it the happiest turne that euer came to him, to light in such a time, to doe such an acte. For, had any other man preuented him of that, he coulde neuer haue founde the like occasion possiblie to haue requited the peoples good willes vnto him, in such as in that. Nowe therefore this seconde triumphe and first Consulshippe being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothing the greater, nor better man. And yet was it a shewe and signification of his greatnesse, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time dealt in matters of state, and made more estimation of himselfe then of Pompey and all the rest) neuer durst once demaunde: before he had craued Pompeyes good will. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had sought occasion of long time to pleasure him: and thereupon made earnest suite vnto the people for him, assuring them he would as much thanke them for making Crassus his colleague and fellow Consull, as he would, for making himselfe Consull. All this notwithstanding, when they were created Consulles, they were in all things contrarie one to another, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Consuls together. Crassus had more authoritie with the Senate but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he restored them the office of the Tribune, and passed by edict, that the Knightes of ROME should haue full power againe to iudge causes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleasant sight also vnto the people, when he came with the Censors in person, to pray that he might be dispenced withall for going to the warres. For it was an ancient custome in ROME, that the Knightes of ROME hauing serued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, should bring their horse in the middest of the market place before the two Censors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whom they had serued, in what iornies and countries they had bene, and hauing also deliuered account of their good behauior and seruice, they then prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good seruice, there were they honourablie rewarded: or otherwise openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Censors, being honorably set in their tribunall or iudgement seate, taking view of all the ROMAINS Knightes that mustered before them, to be seene and examined, they maruelled when they sawe Pompey comming at the farther ende of the market place, hauing all the markes of a Consull borne before him, and himselfe leading his horse in his hande by the bridle. When Pompey as a knight of Rome sueth to be discharged from the warres.

Pompey submitteth himselfe to the Censors.

Pompey came neerer, and that they sawe it was he, he commaunded his sergeauntes that caried the axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Censors sate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and reioycing, being verie silent. The Censors themselues also were maruellous glad to see him so obedient to the lawe, and did him great reuerence. In fine the elder of the Censors did examine him in this sorte. Pompey the great, I pray thee tell mee if thou hast serued so long time in the warres as the lawe doeth appoint? Then answered Pompey aloude: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my selfe. The people hearing this aunswer, made an open shoute for ioy, they were so gladde to heare it: and the Censors them-selues came from their iudgement seate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his house, to please the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their hands, with great signes of ioy. At the ende of their Consulshippe, when misliking increased further betweene Pompey and Crassus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time neuer spake in open assembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and tolde the people openly: how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night and had commaunded him to tell both the Consulles from him, that they should not leaue their charge and office, before they were reconciled together. For all these wordes Pompey sturred not. But Crassus first tooke him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the people. My Lordes, I thinke not my selfe dishonored to giue place to Pompey, sith you your selues haue thought him worthy to be called the great, before he had any haire on his face, and vnto whom you graunted the honor of two triumphes before he came to be Senator. When he had sayed his minde, they were made friendes together, and so surrendred vp their office. Now for Crassus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neere as he could gaue ouer to plead mens causes any more, & began litle and litle to withdrawe himselfe from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, comming seldome abroad, & when he did he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rare thing also to see him any more come out of his house, or talke with any man, but he was euer accompanied with a great number, & he reioyced to himselfe, to see that he had alwaies such a traine after him: for that made him to be honored the more, & gaue him great countenance to see him thus courted, thinking it dishonor to him to be familiar with meane persons. For men that rise by armes, are easily despised, when they come to liue like priuate citizens: because they cannot fashion themselues to be companions with the common people, (who citizen-like vse a common familiarity together) but looke to be their betters in the city, as they are in the field. Yea & contrarily, they that doe acknowledge themselues to be their inferiors in warres: will thinke foule scorne if they be not their superiors in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrier among them that followeth publike causes (which hath triumphed for many victories and battelles he hath obtained) they obscure his glory, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they doe not otherwise enuie any souldiers that are contented equally to giue them place and authoritie, as plainly appeared shortly after, by Pompey himselfe. By such an occasion, the power of pirats on the sea, tooke beginning in the coutry of Cilicia, which was not reckoned of at the first, because it was not perceiued, till they grew bold and venturous in king Mithridates wars, being hired to do him seruice. And afterwards the Romaines being troubled with ciuill warres, one fighting with another euen at Rome gates, the sea not being looked to all this while, it set them a gog, and made them go farther then euer they did before. For they did not only rob & spoile all marchant venturers by sea, but rifled also all the Iles & townes vpon the sea coast: insomuch as there ioyned with them, men of great wealth & nobilitie, and of great wisdom also, & entred into their fellowshippe, as into a commendable faculty. Now they had set vp at sea alls on state houses in sundry places, they had sundry hauens and beacons on the land, to giue warning by fire all alongst the sea coast, and those well kept and watcht: moreouer, they had great fleetes of ships ready furnisht with excellent good galliots of ores, skilfull pilots & mariners, their shippes of swift saile, & pinnaces for discouery, but withall so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all guilt, the coueringes of the same all of purple silke, delighting only to make a glorious shew of their pillage. All the sea.

sea coast ouer, there was no sight of any thing but musicke, singing, banqueting, and rioting, sales of Captaines, and men of great quality, & ransomes of a thousand prisoners: and all this was to the shame & dishonor of the ROMAINES. Their ships were about a thousand in number, & they had taken aboue 400. townes. They had spoiled & destroied many holy temples that had neuer bene touched before. As the temple of the twins in the Ile of CLAROS, the temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the citie of HERMION, & the temple of Æsculapius at EPIDAVRVM: the temples of Neptune in ISTHMOS, TÆNARIA, and CALAVRIA: and the temples of Apollo in ACTIVM, in the Ile of LEVCADES: the temples of Iuno in SAMOS, in ARGOS, & in LYCANIA. They had also many strange sacrifices & certain ceremonies of religion amongst themselues, in the mount Olympus, & among other, the misterie of Mithres, which remaine vnto this time: and remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent parts and iniuries they did the ROMAINES vpon the sea, they went a land, & where they found any houses of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoiled and destroyed them: and on a time they tooke two ROMAINE Prætors, Sextilius & Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their sergeants & officers attending on them, & caried them quite away. An other time also they stale away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honor of triumph) as she went a walking abroad in the fields, and she was redeemed for a great summe of money. But yet the greatest spight & mockery they vsed to the ROMAINES, was this. That when they had taken any of them, and that he cryed he was a citizen of ROME, and named his name: then they made as though they had bene amazed, and affraide of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The poore prisoner thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled themselues as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, and put shoes on his feete: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMAINE fashion, for fear (said they) least he should be mistaken an other time. When they had played all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their ship ladders, and willed him on it, and bad him go his way, he should haue no hurt: and if he would not go of him selfe, then they cast him ouer the bord by force, and sent him packing. These rouers and sea theeues had all the sea Mediterraneum at commandement: insomuch there durst not a marchant looke out, nor once traffique that sea. And this was the onely cause that moued the ROMAINES (fearing scarsity of victuals, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recouer the signiory & empire of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall, or Generall by sea, but should haue absolute power to command all manner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge: was Gabinius, Pompeys friend. The summe of this decree gaue him full power and absolute authoritie of all the sea from Hercules pillers, and of the maine land, the space of foure hundred furlongs from the sea. (For the ROMAINES dominions at that time in fewe places were further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations and mighty kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the Senate fifteene Lieutenants, & to giue vnto euery one of them, seuerall prouinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the treasure, of the Generall receiuers of the state, to defray the charges of a fleete of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leauie what men of warre hee thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he listed. This law when it had bene read openly ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceede all enuie, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to giue such absolute power vnto a priuate person. Whereupon, they were all against it but Cæsar, who fauoured the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey, as the people, whose fauor he sought. The noble men fell marueilously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consuls was very hotte with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steps, but peraduenture he would come shott of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stoode vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuy, to speake many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduiſed the people to ſpare him, and not to venture in ſuch dangerous warres (one after another) a man of ſo great account, as they ought to make of him. If yee chance to looſe him (ſaid he: whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your ſelfe. The perceiuing that he loſt his labour, ſeeking to turne the people from their determination: he left it there, and ſaide no more. Roſcius to ſe next after him to ſpeake, but he could haue no audience. When he ſawe that he could not be heard, he made a ſigne with his fingers, that they ſhould not giue Pompey alone this authoritie, but ioyne an other with him. The people being offended withall made ſuch an outcrie vppon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that inſtant, was ſtriken blind and fell downe amongſt the people. Whereby it appeared that foule falling out of the aire to the ground, doe not fall for that the aire is broken or proceed with any force or furie: but becauſe the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with ſuch a violence, as it maketh a very tempeſt in the aire) doth ſtrike and ouercome them. Thus for that day, the aſſembly brake vp, and nothing paſt: and at the day appointed when this decree ſhould paſſe by voices of the people, Pompey went abroad into the country. There being aduertiſed that the decree was paſt for the confirmation of his charge, he returned againe by night into the citie, becauſe he would auoide the enuie they would haue borne him to haue ſeene them run out of all parts of the citie vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and ſacrificed to the goddes: and audience being giuen him at an open aſſembly, he handled the matter ſo, that they gaue him many things beſides to enlarge his power, almoſt doubling the preparation ſet downe and appointed at the firſt decree. For he ordained that the common wealth ſhould arme him fiue hundred ſhippes, and they leuied for him ſixe ſcore thouſand footemen, and fiue thouſand horſemen, and choſe beſides fourſcore and twentie Senators, which had euery one of them bene Generals of armies, and two generall Treaſurers alſo. While things were thus a preparing, the price of victuals fell by chance, which reioyced the people ſo much, that they ſtucke not to ſay, that the name of Pompey only had alreadie ended this warre. This notwithſtanding, he deuided all the ſea betwene the Iles into thirteene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his ſhippes and moreouer, one of his Lieutenantes ouer them. Thus hauing diſperſed his power all broad, he brought all the pirates ſhippes that were in a fleete together, within his daunger, and when had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Nowe for them that had diſperſed themſelues betimes, or that otherwiſe could ſcape his generall chaſe: they fled all into CILICIA, as bees into the beehiue, againſt whom he would needes goe himſelfe in perſon with threeſcore of his beſt ſhippes. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had ſcoured all the THVSCANE ſea, the coaſtes of LYBIA, SARDINIA, SICILE, and of CORSICA: of all theſe theeues which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within fortie dayes ſpace, taking infinite paines, both himſelfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Conſuls called Piſo did all the beſt he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had diſcharged his power men, for that he enuied Pompeys proſperitie: Pompey ſent his ſhippes before to make towardes ITALIE to arriue at the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. He in the meane time, went through THYSCANE to ROME, where, ſo ſoone as his comming was knowen, all the people ran out to meete him, as if he had bene abſent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to ſee him, was the ſodaine change of victuals vnlooked for, that daily came to the towne out of all partes. But Piſo went neere to be depriued of his Conſulſhip: for Gabinius had the decree written, and ready to preſent to the people. But Pompey would not ſuffer it. So, hauing gently brought all to paſſe as he deſired, he went vnto the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and there tooke ſea, and hoiſed ſaile. Now though his haſtie voyage, and ſhortneſſe of time made him paſſe by many good cities without comming into them: notwithſtanding, he would not paſſe by the citie of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had ſacrificed to the goddes, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the citie, he read two writings that were made in his praiſe, the one within the gate which ſaid thus.

At the voice of the people, a crow flying fell downe.

Least he too late should to the battell runne,

But Pompeys fact was worse than this. For he fought for the common enemies of the world, & only to deprive a ROMAINE Prætor of triumph, who had done great good seruice to haue destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not off his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by assault, he put them to death: and afterwardes hauing done Oliuius open shame through his campe, he let him goe. When newes came to ROME, that the pirates warre was brought to good end, & that Pompey hauing no other seruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp & downe: one Manilius a Tribune of the people, put forth an other decree vnto them of this effect. That Pompey taking all the army Lucullus had, & the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with al BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: should go make warr vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands notwithstanding al his iurisdiction and army by sea, in as royall maner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMAINE Empire. For by this second decree, he had all these countries not named in his former commission, added to amplifie his authority, as PHRIGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA & ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome those two mightie Kings. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriuing him of the honor of his doings, to giue it to an other, that should rather succeede him in honour of triumph, than in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifest iniury, and shewed themselues too vnthankefull: but that which most grieued them, was to see Pompeys power established in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore, one of them perswaded and encouraged an other, stoutly to withstand this edict, and not to suffer their libertie to be lost in this sort. Notwithstanding, when the day came that the decree should passe, they were so affraide to anger the people, that their hearts failed them, & none durst speake against it but Catulus onely: that earnestly inueyed against the passing of it a long time together, and greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they should looke to seeke out some mountaine or high rocke to retire safely vnto to defend their libertie, as their ancesters had done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree passed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lorde almost of all that, which Sylla by force of armes and great effusion of bloud (hauing made himselfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power.

Pompey appointed Lucullus successor.

The boldnes of Catulus in dissuading Manilius law.

Pompeys great dissimulation.

When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertising him what the people had past in his behalfe: some say that at the receite of them (in the presence of his familiar friendes that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruellously to haue such great offices and charge laid vpon him, one in the necke of an other, and burst forth in these wordes. O goddes, shall I neuer see an ende of such a world of troubles as I haue? Had it not beene better for me to haue bene a meane man borne and vnknowen, than thus continually to be in warre with armor on my backe? What, shall I neuer see the time, that breaking the neckes of spight and enuy gainst me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my country with my wife & children? When Pompey spake those wordes, his familiar friends could not abide to see his deep dissimulation, knowing that besides his naturall ambition and couetous desire to rule, he was glad in his hart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus, which his deedes forthwith bewrayed. For he presently sent out precepts into euery quarter, commanding all sortes of souldiers to come to him immediatly, and made also all the Princes and kings within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the countries altered and changed all that Lucullus had established before. Furthermore, he did release the penalties enioyned them, and tooke from them also the giftes that Lucullus bestowed on them. In fine, this was all his purpose and desire: to make them that honored Lucullus know, that he had no further power & authority to doe any thing. Lucullus finding himselfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either side thought good they should meete & talke together: which came so to passe, for they met in the country of GALATIA. And because they both were great

Captaines of the ROMAINE armies, and had done many famous acts, they had their sergeants & officers that caried the bundels of rods before them, wreathed about with laurell boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close & woddy country, all couered with greene trees, & Pompey on the other side had passed through a great sandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus sergeantes seeing the laurell boughes drie and withered away, which Pompeys sergeantes caried, they gaue them of their greene and fresh boughes to beautifie the rodes and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In truth Lucullus had bene Consull before Pompey, & so was he also older man than he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, because he had triumphed twise. At their first meting, their entertainment & discourse was with great ceremony and courtesie as might be, one highly praising the others deedes, reioycing at ech others good successe: but at parting, they fell to hotte wordes together, Pompey vpbrayding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, so that their friendes had much a doe to part them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the landes in GALATIA, which he had conquered, and bestowed them & other gifts, on such as he thought good. Pompey on the other side camping hard by him, specially commaunded the people in euery part to obey him in nothing whatsoeuer he did: and besides, he tooke all his souldiers from him, leauing him only sixteene hundred, which he supposed were such, as for disdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but small seruice. Furthermore, to blemish the glory of his doings, he told euery body Lucullus had fought with the pompe & shadow only of these two kings, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with shieldes, swordes, and horses. Lucullus for reuenge on the other side said, that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of warre, like a cowardly bussard that preyeth vpon dead bodies, which others haue slaine: and to cut a sunder the remaine of this warre ended by an other, as he had done before, attributing the honour of the ouerthrowe of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to himselfe, where indeede Metellus, Crassus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therfore it was no maruell, that he sought the glory and honor to triumph for the kingdomes of PONTVS and ARMENIA: sith that through his subtill practises he had obtained triumph for a fewe slaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being nowe gone his way, Pompey sent good garrisons vnto all the coastes vppon the sea, from the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iorney by lande towardes Mithridates, who had in his campe thirtie thousand footemen, and two thousande horsemen, and yet durst not offer battell, but camped first vpon a mountaine of great strength, and hard to get vp on: notwithstanding shortly after, he forsooke it for lacke of water. He was no sooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it. Who, coniecturing by the nature of the plantes and trees in that place which were very greene, and also by diuers holes he found, that for reason thereabouts should be some springs: he commaunded them to digge welles in euery corner, so that in a very short time all his campe had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not find that out in all the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped rounde about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the siege fiue and forty daies, fled away with all the choice of his army, vnknowing to Pompey, hauing first slaine al the sicke and impotent persons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him an other time by the riuer of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would passe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raised his campe againe, & marched away at midnight. About that time, they say, that Mithridates sawe that in a dreame, which did prognosticate what should happen. He thought, that hauing the winde in the poope of the shippe, he was vnder saile, in the middest of the sea of Mare Bosphorum, and that he was maruellous glad of it, and reioyced with them that sailed with him, thinking himselfe certainely past all danger: yet sodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the sea, vpon a litle peece of the shippe that was broken, trusting to the mercy of the windes. As hee was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come so neere, that there was no shift, but they must needes fight to defende their campe. Thereupon his Captaines straight beganne to put his men in battell ray, readie to fight. Pompey vnderstanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compasse them in to keepe them from flying, & then in the morning to set vpon them more easily, his men being the better souldiers. But Pompeys old Captaines were so earnestly in hand with him to perswade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they should giue charge. Now it was not so darke but they could somewhat see, for the moone that was very low and vppon her setting, gaue light enough to discerne the body of a man: yet because the moone was very low, the shadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almost euen to their very enemies, which did let the that they could not certainely iudge what space of ground was betwene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they cast their dartes at the ROMAINES, but they hurt neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, ran vpon the with great cries. But the barbarous people durst not abide their charge they were so affraide, but turned their backes, and ranne away for life, so that they were slaine downe right. Thus were there tenne thousande of the barbarous people slaine and more, and their campe also taken. As for Mithridates himselfe, at the beginning of the onset, he made a lane among the ROMAINES with eight hundred horsemen, & passed cleane through them. But incontinently his men dispersed vpon it, some one way, some an other way, so that he was left alone but with three persons only, whereof Hypsicratea was one of the number, which had euer bene valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cause Mithridates called her Hypsicrates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted also on a horse after the PERSIAN maner, was neuer weary with any long iorney the king made, nor neuer left to wait vpon his person, and to looke to his horse: vntill such time as the king came to a strong castle called Inora, where was great store of gold & siluer, and the kings chiefest treasure. Then Mithridates tooke off his richest apparell he had there, & gaue it amongst them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poison besides to euery one of his friends to cary about them, because they should not (vnlesse they would themselues) fall into their enemies handes aliue. From thence he thought to take his iorney into ARMENIA vnto king Tigranes. Howbeit Tigranes sent to let him, and further proclaimed by trumpet, that he would giue a hundred talentes to him that could kill him. Thereupon, passing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates, he fled through the country of CHOLCHIDA. In the meane time, Pompey inuaded the country of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the younger, who was reuolted against his father, & went to meete with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almost about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the East, and falleth into Mare Caspium. So they both together marched on further into the country, receiuing such townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene consumed and destroyed by Lucullus) vnderstanding that Pompey was of a milde and gentle nature, he receiued his garrisons into his strongest fortes and royall houses, and went himselfe with his friends and kinsemen to meete Pompey, & to yeeld himselfe vnto him. When he came hard to his campe, being a horse back there came out two sergeants of Pompeys, and commanded him to light and go in a foote, for there was neuer man seene a horse back within the ROMAINES campe. Tigranes did not only obey them, but further plucked off his sword and gaue it them: and in fine, when he came almost to Pompey, taking off his royall hat from his head, he would haue laid it at Pompeys feet, & falling downe most shamefully on the ground, imbased himselfe to imbrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himselfe preuented him, and taking him by the hande, made him to sit downe by him on the one side of him, and his sonne on the other. Then he saide vnto them both: as for the other losses you haue susteined heretofore, you must thanke Lucullus for them, who hath taken from you SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my comming, I will let you enioy it, paying to the ROMAINES a fine of fifteen thousand talents for the iniury you had done them, prouided also, that your sonne haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the conditions of peace. The ROMAINES then saluted him king. He was so glad therof, that he promised to giue euery souldier halfe a Mina, euery Centener tenne Minas, and to euery Colonell of a thousand men a talent. His sonne was very angry withall: insomuch as Pompey sending for him to come to supper with him him, he aunſwered againe, that was not the friendſhip he looked for at Pompeys handes, for he ſhould finde many other ROMAINES that would offer him that curteſie. Pompey for his anſwere, clapped him vp as a priſoner, and kept him to be led in triumph at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA ſent Ambaſſadours to Pompey to demaund this young Prince, that was his ſonne in law, & to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates muſt be the vttermoſt confines of his conqueſtes. Pompey aunſwered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his ſonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would do it with iuſtice. So, leauing Afranius in ARMENIA to keepe the country, Pompey paſſed by other nations which inhabite about mount Caucaſus, hauing Mithridates in chaſe: of which nations, two of the chiefeſt & of greateſt power, are the ALBANIANS & IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do ſtretch out vnto mount Moſchium, and to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANS lye towardes the Eaſt, & Mare Caſpium. Theſe men firſt ſuffered Pompey to paſſe through their country, vpon his ſending to thē. But winter hauing ſtolen vpon the ROMAINES while they were there, & they buſily occupied about Saturnes feaſts: the barbarous people hauing leauied aboue forty thouſand fighting men in one camp together, came and paſſed ouer the riuer of Cyrnus. (This riuer commeth from the mountaines of the IBERIANS, and receiuing the riuer of Araxes into it, which paſſeth through ARMENIA, diſperſeth it ſelfe into twelue ſeuerall mouthes, and ſo falleth into Mare Caſpium. Some notwithſtanding hold opinion, that Cyrnus receiueth not the riuer of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it ſelfe, and falleth into the ſame ſea, neare vnto the mouthes of the other.) Pompey might if he had would haue kept them for comming ouer the riuer, yet did he ſuffer them quietly to paſſe ouer. When they were all ouer, he went againſt them, ouercame them in battell, and ſlue a great number of them in the field. Afterwardes he pardoned their king, ſubmitting himſelfe vnto Pompey by his Ambaſſadours, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went againſt the IBERIANS: who were no leſſe in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the firſt, and alſo better ſouldiers, and were reſolutely bent to do good ſeruice vnto Mithridates, and to driue out Pompey. Theſe IBERIANS were neuer ſubiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and ſcaped alſo from being ſubiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexāder neuer ſtayed in the country of HYRCANIA: whom alſo Pompey ouercame in a great and bloudy battell, hauing ſlaine nine thouſand in the field, and taken ten thouſand priſoners. From thence he went into the countrey of COLCHIS. There Seruilius met him by the riuer of Phaſis, with the fleete of ſhippes with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himſelfe amongſt a people that were neighbours vnto the ſtraights of BOSPHORVS, and the mariſſes Meotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore alſo, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Thereupon he paſſed againe ouer the riuer of Cyrnus, with great paine and daunger, becauſe the barbarous people had made a ſtrong defence a great way alongeſt the riuer ſide, with a maruellous number of great trees, feld and layed a croſſe one ouer an other. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty paſſed through thē, he fell into an euill fauoured coūtrey, where he ſhould trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he cauſed ten thouſand goats skinnes to be filled with water, and ſo went forward to meete with his enemies, whom he found by the riuer of Abas, being ſixe ſcore thouſand footemen, and twelue thouſand horſemen, but all (or the moſt of them) ill armed with wild beaſtes skinnes. Their Chiefetaine was Coſis, the kings owne brother. He, when the battell was begun, flew vpon Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on the other ſide, ranne him through with his launce on both ſides, & ſlue him ſtarke dead. Some ſay alſo, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battell, which fought of the barbarous peoples ſide, cōming frō the mountaines that runne alongeſt the riuer of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrow giuen, the ROMAINES ſpoyling the dead, found targets, and buskinnes of the AMAZONES, but not the body of a woman among them. They alſo do inhabite on the ſide of the mountaine Caucaſus that looketh towardes Mare Hyrcanium, and do not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELE, and the LELEGES are betweene them, with whom they company two monthes yearely euery yeare meeting together, by the riuer of Thermodon, and all the reſt of the yeare, they liue a part by themselues. After this last battell, Pompey going to inuade the country of HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venemous serpẽts which he met with, being come within three dayes iourney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there receiued presents which were sent vnto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, & wrote very curteously vnto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with part of his armie against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the country of GORDIENA, & harried & spoyled the king of Tigranes subiectes. Notwithstanding, he draue him out, & followed him vnto ARBELITIDE. Furthermore, all the lemmans and cõcubines of king Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but sent them all home againe, to their parents and friends, because the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of noble men, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans, had most credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his castell, where the greatest part of his treasure of gold and siluer lay, was a singers daughter, who as they sayd, was not rich but an old man. She hauing song one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in such fancie with her, that he would needes haue her lye with him the same night, and the old man her father went home offended, because the king would not so much as giue him one gentle word. But the next morning when he rose, he maruelled to see the tables in his house full of plate of gold and siluer, and a great company of seruing men, groomes of chamber and pages, and that they had brought him maruellous rich apparell, and a horse ready at the gates brauely furnished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroad into the citie: he thought it was done in mockerie, to haue made sport with him, and therefore would haue runne his way, had not the seruing men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that dyed of late, which the king had bestowed on him, and that all this he saw, was but a little portion in respect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, at the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got vp a horse backe, and riding through the streetes, cried, all this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told them: maisters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so mad for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this castell into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich presents: but he would take none of them, other then such as serued to adorne the temples of the goddes, and to beautifie his triumph, and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the king of the IBERIANS, hauing sent him a bedstead, a table, and a chaire of cleane gold, praying him to take it as a remembraunce from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treasurers custodie, to be accountable for it vnto the state. In an other castell called Cœnon, he found certaine secret letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruellously to read, because thereby he plainly vnderstood the kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poysoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne sonne, and Alcæus the SARDIANIAN, because he had wonne the bell, at the horse race before him. There was also interpreting of dreames, that either himselfe or his wiues had dreamed, and also loue letters betwixt Monimé and him. Theophanes writeth also, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he intised and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMAINES to death that were in Asia. Howbeit in reason men thinke, that this was a shamefull lye, maliciously deuised by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, because he was but a counterfeit to him: or peraduenture to gratifie Pompey, whose father Rutilius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence Pompey departed towardes the citie of AMISVS. There his ambition brought him to commit such factes, as he himselfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemy being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to establish lawes, to giue giftes, and distribute such honours, as Captaines that had obtained victorie were wont to do, when they had ended all warre and trouble. For he himselfe (Mithridates being yet the stronger in the realme of BOSPHORVS, and hauing a great puissant army about him) did all that which he reproued an other for, appointing prouinces, and geuing out giftes to euery man according as he deserued: to gratifie twelue twelue barbarous kings, with diuers other Princes, Lordes and Captaines, that came to him thither. Writing also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to giue him that title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great desire to winne SYRIA, and to go through the country of ARABIA, euen vnto the red sea, because he might enlarge his conquestes and victories euery way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum, that compasseth all the whole earth. For in LIBYA, he was the first ROMAINE that conquered all to the great sea. On the other side, in SPAYNE he enlarged the Empire of ROME, & brought the confines thereof vnto Mare Atlanticũ. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chase, he came almost vnto Mare Hyrcaniũ. Thus he put himselfe in iourney, intending his circuite vnto the red sea, specially because he saw Mithridates so ill to follow, & worse to ouercome by force when he fled, thẽ when he fought my battell: and that made him say, that he would leaue a sharper enemy behinde him, then himselfe: and that he ment, famine. For he appointed souldiers with sufficient number of shippes, to lye in wait for the marchaunts that sayled to the country of BOSPHORVS, to cary them any victuals or other marchaundises, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best part of his army, and in his way, found the bodies of dead ROMAINES which Mithridates had ouerthrowen vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, & were yet vnburied. So he caused them all to be taken vp, & honourably buried. Lucullus hauing forgotten, or otherwise neglected to do it, in my conscience that was the chiefest cause why his men did hate him. Pompey now hauing by Afranius subdued the ARABIANS, dwelling about mount Amanus, went himselfe in person into SYRIA, and made a gouernement & prouince of it, being won to the ROMAINE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king: and conquered all IVRIE also, where he tooke king Aristobulus, and builded certaine cities there, and deliuered others also from bondage, which by tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chastised well enough. Howbeit he spent the most part of his time there, deciding of controuersies, pacifying of contentions and quarels by arbiterment, which fell out betwixt the free cities, Princes and kings, and sent of his friends into those places where he could not come himselfe. For on a time when he was chosen arbitratour betwixt the PARTHIANS & the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a country which both parties claimed: he sent three commissioners thither to iudge definitiuely betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame & renowne were great, no lesse was his vertue, iustice and liberalitie, which indeede did hide many faults, his friends and familiars about him did commit. For truely he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did vse them so well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter: that he made them contented, patiently to beare their couetousnesse and straight dealing. One of his chiefest familiars about him whom he loued best, was called Demetrius, a bondman infrãchised, who otherwise was very discrete in his doings, but being somewhat too bold of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a young man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble minde, in Pompeys absence went to see the city of ANTIOCH. Now for himself, his maner was alwayes to go a foote, and all his friends besides that did accompany him to honour him, were a horseback. He perceiuing a farre off, a great sort of people comming towardes him all in white, and of one side of the streete litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring at the first he was angry with all, thinking they had done it for his sake to honor him, that they made this procession, which he in no wise would haue had done. Thereupon he commaunded his friends to light from their horses, and to go a foote with him. But when they came neare to the gate of the citie, the maister of the ceremonies that led this procession, hauing a garland on his head, and a rod in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them: where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes friends laughed to heare this question: then sayd Cato alas poore citie, and so passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey himselfe was cause that Demetrius had the lesse ill will borne him, then otherwise he should haue had: because they saw how boldly he would vse Pompey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden some to dinner or supper, while he was entertaining and welcomming of them, and would tary till they were all come. Demetrius would be set at the bord, and presumptuously haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of this iourney, he had already purchased the goodliest houses of pleasure and fayrest walkes that were about ROME, and had sumptuous gardens also, the which the people commonly called Demetrius gardens: though his maister Pompey was but meanly housed till his third Consulship. Howbeit afterwardes, he built that famous stately Theater, called Pompeys Theater, and ioyned vnto that also an other house, as a penthouse to his Theater, farre more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. In somuch as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he maruelled, and asked where abouts it was, that Pompey dyned & supped. Their things are reported thus. Now, the king of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the castell called Petra, hauing neuer vntill that time made any accompt of the ROMAINES army, was this greatly afrayed of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to do what he would commaunde him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he ment as he spake, brought his army before this castell of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, because they iudged it was an occasion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, against whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an auncient enemy to ROME, and that began to gather strength againe, and prepared (as they heard say) to lead a great army through SCYTHIA & PANNONIA into ITALIA. But Pompey thinking he should sooner minish his power by suffering him to go on with warres, then that he should otherwise be able to take him flying: would not toyle to follow him in vaine. And for these causes he would needes make warres in other places, and linger time so long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farre from the castell of Petra, and had lodged his camp for that day: as he was riding and managing his horse vp and downe the camp, postes came flinging to him from the realme of PONTVS, and brought him good newes, as was easily to be discerned a farre off by the heades of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with laurell boughes. The souldiers perceiuing that, flocked straight about him: but Pompey would make an end of his riding first, before he read these letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his horse, and returned into his camp, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand vpon to speake vnto them, and againe, the souldiers would not tarie the making of one after the manner of their camp, which men of warre do make themselues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them vpon an other: but for hast and earnest desire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they layd together a heape of saddles one vpon an other, and Pompey getting vp on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himselfe with his owne hands, because his sonne Pharnaces did rebell against him, and had wonne all that which his father possessed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for himselfe and the ROMAINES. Vpon these newes, all the camp (ye may imagine) made wonderfull ioy, and did sacrifice to the goodes, giuing them thankes, and were as merry, as if in Mithridates person alone, there had dyed an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occasion, hauing brought this warre more easily to passe then he hoped for, departed presently out of ARABIA, and hauing speedily in few dayes passed through the countrys lying by the way, he came at length to the citie of AMISVS. There he found great presents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kings blood: and amongst the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, because they that had the carying of his body had forgotten to drie vp the braine: neuertheless such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine scarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to auoid enuie, sent him away vnto the citie of SINOPE. He wondred much at the maruellous sumptuous rich apparell and weapons that he ware. The scabberd of his sword (which cost foure hundred talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a hat of Mithridates of wonderfull workemanship, being begged of Caius his foster brother, was secretly giuen to Faustus, the sonne of Sylla, without Pompeys priuity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey hauing ordered all things and established that prouince, went on his iorney homewards with great great pompe and glory. So, comming vnto MYTILENE, he released the citie of all taxes and payments for Theophanes sake, and was present at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their workes, contending one with an other, hauing at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompeys actes and ieستes. Pompey liked exceeding well the Theater where these playes were made, and drew a model or platforme of it to make a stately one then in ROME. As he passed by the citie of RHODES, he would needs heare all the Rethoritians, and gaue euery one of them a talent. Possidonius hath written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rethoritian, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey did giue them; touching the generall question. Pompey did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philosophers there. For he gaue towardes the reedifying of the city againe, fifty talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALIE, to haue bene very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home, to see his wife & children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the fortune which the charge giuen him to mingle fortunes prosperity, with some bitter soppe of aduersity, layed a blocke in his way at home in his owne house, to make his returne more sorrowfull. For Mutia his wife had in his absence played false at tables. But Pompey being then farre off, made no account of the reportes nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare into ITALIE, and that he was more attentiue to giue eare to the ill reportes he heard: then he sent vnto her to tell her, that he forsaked her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Nor withstanding, by other Epistles the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumours rane abroade in ROME which troubled them sore, being giuen out that he would bring his armie straight to ROME, and make himselfe absolute Lord of all the ROMANE Empire. Crassus thereupon, either for that he beleeued it indeede to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accusation more odious and the enuie towardes Pompey the greater, conueyed himselfe, his familie, and goodes, priuily out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALIE, called all his souldiers together, & after he had made an oration vnto them, as time and occasion required, he commanded them to seuer themselues, and euery man to repaire home to apply his businesse, remembring to meete at ROME together, at the day of his triumphe. His army being thus dispersed, & straight spred abroad for newes: a marueilous thing happened vnto him. The cities seeing Pompey so great without souldiers, hauing but a small traine about him of his familiar friends onely: went all of the to meete him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquestes, but from some iourney taken for his pleasure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: so that if he had bene disposed to haue made any innouatiõ in the common wealth, he had not needed his army. In those dayes there was a law, that no man should enter into ROME before his triumphe: whereupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to graunt the chusing of Consuls for a few dayes, because he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yeare. They denied him his request, by Catoes meanes that hindred Pompey marueiling to heare of his boldnes & plaine speach, which he only vsed of all other to defend his iust causes: had a marueilous desire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato hauing two neeces, Pompey desired to marry the one himselfe, & the other for his son. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompeys, that it was a colour only to win & corrupt him, denied him. His wife & sister on the other side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliãce with Pompey the great. About that time it chãced, that Pompey being very desirous to preferre Vatinius to be Consull, he caused certaine money to be giuen amongst the tribes of the people, & the same was deliuered out to some, euen in his owne gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city, euery man spake ill of Pompey: that he put the Consulship to sale for money vnto those that could not deserue it by vertue, sith himselfe only had obtained it by purchase of many a noble and worthy deede. Then sayd Cato to his wife & sister: loe now, we had bene partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. Whẽ they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equitie & his honour. But now to his triumphe. For the sumptuousnesse & magnificẽce ther of, although he had two dayes space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the shew, that were not seene, which would haue ferued to haue set out an other triumphe. First there were tables caried, whereon were written the names and titles of all the people and nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow. The kingdome of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, BITHYNIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA & PALESTINE, IVDÆA, & ARABIA: the pirats which he had ouercome both by sea & by land, in all parts of the world. In all these countryes, he tooke about a thousand castels, few lesse then nine hundred townes and cities, pirats ships eight hundred, & nine & thirtie desolate townes left without inhabitants, replenished againe with people by him. Moreouer, these tables declared, that the reuenue of the common wealth of ROME before these conquestes he made, amounted yearely but to fine thousand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the summes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they should now receiue eight thousand & fine hundred Miriades: & that he brought precious ready gold & siluer, & in plate & iewels, to put into the common treasury, the value of twenty thousand talents; besides that which had bene distributed already amongst the souldiers: the which, he that had left for his share, had fifteen hundred Drachmas. The prisoners that were led in the show of this triumph, besides the Captaines of the pirats, were these that follow. The sonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife and daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime: Aristobulus king of IVDÆA: Mithridates sister with fine sonnes of hers, & some Ladies of SCYTHIA. The hostages also of the IBERIANS & the ALBANIANS, & of the kings of the COMMAGENIANS: ouer & besides a great number of other notable trophies which himselfe or his Lieutenants had won at sundry battels in diuers places. But the greatest honour that euer he wanne, and which neither other Consull of the ROMAINES but himself obtained, was this: that he made his third triumph of the three parts of the world. Diuers other ROMAINES had triumphed thrise before him, howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICKE: the second time of EVROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by these three triumphes that he had triumphed in manner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time, (as is reported by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the great) vnder foure and thirtie yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare forty. O happy had it bene for him, if he had dyed when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwardes, made his prosperitie hatefull, or his aduersity miserable. Imploying the honour and authoritie he had gotten by his valiantnesse, fauouring mens vniuste causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honour, and vnwares brought his greatnesse to nothing. For like as when the strongest place of a citie, which receiuing their enemies into them, do giue them the benefite of their owne strength: euen so, through Pompeys power, Cæsar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he imployed, to the ouerthrow of others. And thus it fortuned. Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had vncurteously vsed him) was very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to ROME. For the Senate did counsell and incourage him to deale in the affaires of the state, seeing him wanne of late flow, & giuen too much to his ease and pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gotten. So when Pompey was come, he began to speake against him, and through the friendship and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and reiected. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes the most impudent and vilest person was Clodius: who receiued him, & made him a prey vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, & against his honour caried him vp & down the market place after him, to speake as occasion serued to confirme any matter or decree which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his good will, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he would forsake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of common wealth. Pompey graunted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in daunger of law, and requiring Pompeys friendship to helpe him, he shut his doore against them that came to speake in his behalfe, and went out himselfe at an other backe doore. Cicero thereupon fearing the extremitie of law, willingly forsooke ROME. At that time, Iulius Cæsar returning home from his worldshippe out of SPAINE, beganne to lay such a plotte, that presently brought him into his favour, and afterwardes much increased his power, but otherwise vtterly vndid Pompey the common wealth. Now he was to sue for his first Consulshippe, and considering the matie betwixt Pompey and Crassus, if he ioyned with the one, he made the other his enemies: desired to make them friendes, a thing seeming of great honestie at the first sight, but yet a silent deuise, and as subtile a practise as could be. For the power of the citie being before time into two partes (as a shippe euenly ballest of ech side) and maintained the common both vpright: being now brought into one mans power, there was no possibilitie to withstand, so that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon, Cato wisely told them afterwardes, how the ciuill warres betwixt Pompey and Cæsar was cause of the destruction of the common wealth: that their enmity and discord was not the chiefe originall cause of this miserie, but their friendshippe and agreement. For by their friendshippe Cæsar was chosen Consull, straight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for restoring of the colonies belonging to ROME, and for distributing of lands to them that had none, imbasing the authoritie and dignitie of the chiefe Magistrate, and making the Consulshippe in maner no better then the Tribuneship of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellow Consull, did what he could to resist him, and Cato also did aide him to his power: vntill Cæsar openly brought Pom- pey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did giue his consent to the decrees which he did set forth. Pompey aunswered him, he did.

Why then, said Cæsar, if any man will by force let the passing of this law by voices of the people, wilt thou not then come to helpe them? Yes that I will in deede, said Pompey. Against all them that threaten with the sword, I will bring both sworde and target. Pompey in all his life time did nor spake thing that men more misliked, then that which he said at that time. His friends excused him, and said it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware: but his deedes afterwards shewed, that he was altogether at Cæsars commaundement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cæsar, which was affianced, or made sure before, to Seruilius Cæpio when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpioes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whom he had also promised before vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla. Cæsar also maried Calphurnia, the daughter of Piso. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with souldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Consull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they sodainly set vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him: and some one, whatsoeuer he was, cast a basket of horse dung vpon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were very sore hurt. By this meanes, hauing cleared the market place of all their enemies, they passed the law for diuision of lands, as they would themselues. The people being fleshed with this baite, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would neuer sticke at any matter that they would haue passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was against: and they appointed vnto Cæsar also, the gouernment of the GAVLES on this side and beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for fiue yeares space, with foure whole legions. The next yeare following were appointed Consuls, Piso Cæsars father in law, and Gabinius the greatest flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things stood in these tearmes, Bibulus though he were Consull, kept him selfe close in his house for eight monethes space, and onely sent out billes, and set them vp on euery post in open places, accusing Pompey and Cæsar. Cato on the other side, as if he had bene inspired with the spirite of prophecy, tolde openly in the Senate house, what would become of the common wealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay still and tooke his pleasure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey said: it was more vnseasonable for an old man to follow his pleasure, then to attend matters of the common wealth. Yet him selfe shortly after was so doted of his yong wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the country, and in his gardens, and leaue all affairs of waight aside. Whereupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, despised Pompey, and beganne to enter into seditious attempts. For when he had driuen Cicero out of ROME, and had sent away Cato to make warres in CYPRVS, and that Cæsar also was occupied in GAVLE, and finding that the people in like case were at his commaundement, because to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo some things that Pompey had established. Amongst other things, he tooke Tigranes out of prison, and euer caried him vp and downe with him whersoeuer he went, and continually pict quarrels vnto Pompeys friends, to trie what credit he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common assembly, to heare how a matter of his was hādled: this Clodius hauing a company of vagabondes and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be seene from the rest, began to aske these questions out aloude. Who is the licentiousest Captaine in all this city? What man is he that seekes for a man? What is he that scratcheth his head with one finger? They like a companie of dauncers or singers, when he spake and clapped his hands on his gowne, answered him straight aloude to euery question, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys hart, that was not wonte to heare himself ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any such kinde of fight: but yet it made him bite the lip more, when he saw the Senate glad to see him thus shamed and reproued, as it were reuenge and punishment for his vile betraying and forsaking of Cicero. So great sturre and vproare being made vpon this in the market place, and many men sore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken also in the prease of the people with a sword in his hand, very neere vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwise fearing Clodius insolencie and proud words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home still, consulting with his friends what way he should take to appease the anger of the Senate against him. Thereuppon, one of his friends called Culeo, perswaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuse Cæsars friendship, and to sticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithstanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counsell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauour with the Senate. Thereuppon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to moue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuers were slaine of either side: notwithstanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauour with the Senate, and standing with the lawe propounded to giue Pompey authoritie to cause corne to be brought to ROME, he once againe made him haue power both by land and sea to ouer all the territories of the ROMAINES. For all the hauens, marts & faires, and all store houses for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandise and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accusing him, said: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of victuals, but that they made a dearth of victuals, because the law should passe, to reuiue Pompeys power and authoritie againe, that was almost vnder foote. Other say, that this was a deuise of Lentulus Spinther the Consull, who gaue Pompey the greater authoritie, because he might be sent to put king Ptolomy againe into his kingdome. This notwithstanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred an other law to send Pompey without an army, with two sergeants only to carie the axes before him, to bring Ptolomy in fauor againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This law seemed not to mislike Pompey: but the Senate with honest colour put by this law, as being afraide least Pompeys person should miscary in so doing. Neuertheless, litle papers were found throwne about the market place, and the Senate house, declaring that Ptolomy desired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers stead. Timagenes writeth notwithstanding, that Ptolomy went vnto ROME, & left ÆGYPT without any occasion giuen him, at the persuasion of Theophanes, who perswaded him to do so, because he would giue Pompey occasion to make new warres. But Theophanes craft and subtilty made not this matter so credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambitiō was nothing so vile nor ill, as that was. So, Pompey hauing now full authority to cause corne to be brought to ROME, he sent then his Lieutenants and friends abroade, and himselfe in person wente into SICILE. Nowe being ready to returne againe, there rose such a storme of winde in the sea, that the mariners were in doubt to wey their anckers. But himselfe first imbarked, and commanded them straight to hoise saile, crying out aloude, it is of necessitie I must go, but not to liue. So, through his boldnesse and good spirite, vsing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of marte, and markets with corne, and all the sea besides with shippes: insomuch, the plenty he brought did not only furnish the city of ROME, but all their neighbours also about them, and came like a lively spring that dispersed it selfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conquests that Cæsar made in GAVLE, did set him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres farre from ROME, with the BELGEANS, SWISSES, and Englishmen: he by secret practise, was in the middest among the people at ROME, & most against Pompey in the waightiest affaires of the commonwealth. For he had the power of an armie about his person, which he did harden with paines and continuall practise, not with intent to fight onely against the barbarous people: for the battels he had with them, were in maner but as a hunting sporte, by the which he made himselfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the worlde. But furthermore, by the infinite gold & siluer, and the incredible spoiles and treasure which he wan vpon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by sending great presents also to ROME, to the AEdiles, Prætors, Consuls, and their wiues, he purchased him many friends. Therefore, after he had passed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of LVCA: a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate themselues almost two hundred persons (and amongst them, Crassus and Pompey by name) went out of ROME vnto him. Furthermore, there were seene at Cæsars gate, sixe score sergeants carying axes before Prætors, or Proconsuls. So Cæsar sent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good words: but with Pompey and Crassus, he made a matche, that they two together should sue to be Consuls, and that he himselfe would send them good aide to ROME, at the day of election, to giue their voices. And if they were chosen, that they should then practise by decree of the people, to haue the gouernments of some new prouinces and armies assigned them: and withall, that they should adiorne the gouernment of those prouinces he had, for fiue yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and spred abroad through ROME, the honestest sort misliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open assembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would sue for the Consulship at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make answere, Pompey spake first, and said: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Crassus answered more gently, that he would doe that which should be best for the commonwealth. Then Marcellinus sharpely inueying against Pompey, he angrily againe cast him in the teeth, and said, that Marcellinus was the rankest churle, and the vnthankfullest beast in the world: for that of a dum man he had made him eloquent, and being in manner starued and famished, many a time he had filled his bellie. This notwithstanding, diuers that before were determined to sue for the Consulship, went no further in it, sauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counselled and incouraged not to giue it ouer: for, said he, thou doest not contend for the Consulship, but to defend the common libertie of thy country against two tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, least that hauing all the Senates good willes, he should drawe also the best parte of the people after him: thought it not good to suffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this ende therefore, he sent men armed against him, who at the first onset, slue the torche bearer that caried the torche before him, and made all the rest flie: amongst whom also Cato was the last man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey and Crassus being become Consuls after this sorte, they ordered themselues nothing the more temperately, nor honestly. For first of all, the people being about to choose their prætor, Pompey being at the assembly of the election, perceiuing that they would choose Cato, brake vp the assembly, falsely alleadging that he had noted certaine ill signes, and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they chose Antius and Vatinius prætors. After that, by Trebonius tribune of the people, they published edicts, authorising Cæsars charge for fiue yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæsar. Vnto Crassus also they had appointed SYRIA, and the warre against the PARTHIANS. Vnto Pompey in like case, all AFRICKE, and both SPAYNES, with foure Legions besides of the which, at Cæsars desire, he lent him two legions to help him in his war in GAVLE. These things done, Crassus departed to his Prouince, at the going out of his Consulship: and Pompey remained at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly plaies to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for learning and musicke, and caused wilde beasts also to be baited and hunted, and killed a fiue hundred lions. But of all things, there was no such fearefull sight and terrible fight, as was betweene the elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defraied by Pompey, to shew the people pastime and pleasure made him againe to be very much esteemed of, and beloued amongst the people. But on the other side, he wanne himselfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernement of his Prouinces and Legions into the handes of his Lieutenants, whileſt he himselfe romed vp and downe the pleasaunt places of ITALY, with his wife at his pleasure: either because he was farre in loue with her, or els for that she loued him so dearely, that he coulde not finde in his heart to leaue her companie. It was reported of her, (being knowne of many) that this young lady Iulia loued her husband more dearely, not for Pompeys florishing age, but for his assured continencie, knowing no other woman but her: besides also, he was no solemne man, but pleasant of conuersation, which made women loue him maruellously, vnlesse we will reprone the curtisan Floraes false testimonie. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, men rising sodainly in hurly burly, drew their swords, and many were slaine about Pompey: insomuch as his clothes being bloudied, he sent his men home in haste to fetche him other to change him. His young wife that was great with child, seeing his clothes bloudie, tooke such a fright vpon it, that she fell downe in a sounde before them, and they had much a doe to recouer her, and yet she fell straight in labour vpon it, and was deliuered. So that they themselues, which blamed him most for his good will he bare vnto Cæsar: could not reproue the loue he bare vnto his wife. An other time after that, she was great with child againe, whereof she died, and the childe liued not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carie her into the countrie to be buried, to a house he had there neere vnto the city of ALBA: the people by force tooke her corse, & caried it into the field of Mars, more for the pitie they tooke of the young Ladie, then to pleasure either Cæsar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæsars sake being absent, then for Pompey that was present. But straight when his alliãce was broken, which rather couered, then bridled their ambitious desire to rule: there rose a new sturre in ROME immediatly, and euery mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and seditious words. Not long after that also came newes, that Crassus was ouerthrowne, and slaine in PARTHIA: who was a manifest stay and let to keepe them two from ciuill warres, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themselues in a reasonable quiet together. But when fortune had taken awaie this third champion, who could haue withstood the better of them both that had ouercome the other: then might haue bene said of these two which remained, as the comicall Poet said:

The death of Iulia the daughter of Cæsar.

The beginning of the dissentiõ betwixt Pompey & Cæsar.

See how these champions purposing each others force to trie, With nointed skin and dusty hands stand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile against nature, hauing no power to stop couetousnesse: in so large and great an Empire, and such a wide countrie besides, could not containe the contentous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read,

Among the gods themselues all things by lot diuided are,
And none of them intrudes himselfe within his neighbours share.

Yet they thought not that the Empire of ROME was enough for them, which were but two. But Pompey spake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would haue done: and that he witnessed by discharging his armie so soone. Then thinking that Cæsar would not discharge his armie, he sought to make himselfe strong against him, by procuring offices of the citie, without any other alteration. Neither would he seeme to mistrust him, but he plainly shewed that he did despise and contemne him. But when he sawe that he could not obtaine the offices of the citie as he would, because the citizens that made the elections were bribed with money: he then left it without a magistrate, so that there was none either to command or that the people should obey. Hereupon there ran a brute straight, that there must needes be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius tribune of the people who persuaded them to choose Pompey. But Cato stuck so stoutly against it, that the Tribune had like to haue lost his office, euen in the market place. But then many of Pompeys friends stepped vp, and excused him, saying: that he neither sought, nor would haue the Dictatorship.

Then

Then Cato commended him much, and praying him to see good order kept in the common wealth: Pompey being ashamed to denie so reasonable a request, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Consuls were chosen, Domitius, and Messala: but afterwardes when the state began to change againe, by the death of one of the Consuls, and that diuers were more earnestly bent to haue a Dictator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with furie, determined to giue Pompey some office of reasonable authoritie, to keepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Insomuch, Bibulus himselfe being chiefe of the Senate, and Pompeys enemie, was the first that moued, Pompey might be chosen Consull alone: for, said he, by this meanes, either the commonwealth shall be ridde of the present trouble: or else it shalbe in bondage to an honest man. This opinion was maruelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato standing vp, it was thought straight he would haue spoken against him. But silence being made him, he plainly tolde them, that for his owne part he would not haue bene the first man to haue propounded that was spoken: but sithence it was spoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, said he, it is better to haue an office to commaund, whatsoeuer he be, rather then none: and that he saw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, in so troublesome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen sole Consull: and that if he sawe in his discretion he should neede the assistance of an other companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were past. Thus was Pompey made Consul alone by Sulpitius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made very friendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honor he had done to him, praying him priuately to assist him with his counsell in the Consulship. Cato answered him, that there was no cause why he should thanke him, for he had spoken nothing for his sake, but for respect of the commonwealth onely: and for his counsell, if he would aske it, he should priuately haue it, if not, yet that he would openly say that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the citie, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Crassus the sonne, that was slaine in PARTHIA, to whom she was maried a maiden. This Lady had excellent gifts to be beloued besides her beautie. For she was properly learned, could play well on the harpe, was skilfull in musicke and geometrie, and tooke great pleasure also in philosophie, and not vainely without some profit. For she was very modest and sober of behauiour, without brawling & foolish curiositie, which commonly yong women haue, that are indued with such singular gifts. Her father also, was a noble man, both in bloud, and life. Notwithstanding, these vnlike mariages did nothing please some: for Cornelia was young enough to haue bene his sonnes wife. Now the best citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the commonwealth, being in such a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedie to redresse the same: and that he in the meane time gaue himselfe ouer to marying and feasting, where rather he should haue bene carefull of his Consulship, which was imposed vpon him against the lawe, for common calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had bene quiet. Furthermore, he sharpely proceeded against them, which by bribrie and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the administration of Iustice otherwise, he dealt iustly and vprightly in all things, giuing safetie, order, silence and grauitie, to matters of iudgement, with force of armes, himselfe being present: saiuing that when his father in lawe was also accused among other, he sent for the three hundred & threescore Iudges home to his house, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuser saw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges themselues, returning into the market place: he let fall his sute. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he hauing made a lawe, that no man should praise the offendors, whilest their matter was a hearing: came himselfe and openly praised Plancus being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, stopped his eares with both his hands, saying: that he might not heare an offender praised, seeing it was forbidden by lawe. But therefore he was chosen for a Iudge, before they gaue sentence. Notwithstanding, Plancus was condemned by all the rest of the Iudges, to Pompeys great shame and reproache. Shortly after, Hypseus, one that had bene Consull, being likewise accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bathe to go to ſupper: vpon his knees he beſought Pompeys fauour and helpe. But he ſtarely paſſed by him, and gaue him no other aunſwere, but tolde him, he marred his ſupper, and ſaid nothing els to him. This inconſtancy was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwile he ſet all things in good order, and choſe his father in lawe Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Conſulſhip, for the fiue laſt moneths. After that, he cauſed the gouernement of his prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commiſſion to take yearely out of the treaſure a thouſand talents to defray the charges of this warre. Cæſars friend ſeeing that, ſtepped vp for him, and praied that there might alſo be had ſome conſideration of him that had likewiſe great warres for the Empire of ROME: ſaying, that his good ſeruice deſerued either that they ſhould make him Conſull againe, or elſe that they ſhould prolong his charge and gouernment, ſo as he might yet peaceably enioy the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to the end that no other ſucceſſor might reape the fruite of his labour. Much ſturre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for good will he ment to excuſe the enuie they might haue borne Cæſar, ſaid: that he had receiued letters from him, by the which he requeſted a ſucceſſor, and to be diſcharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they ſhould graunt him priuiledge to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip, although he were abſent. Which Cato ſtoutly withſtood, ſaying, that he muſt returne home as a priuate man, and leauing his armie, ſhould come in perſon to craue recompence of his countrie. But becauſe Pompey made no replie nor aunſwere to the contrie, men ſuſpected ſtraight that he had no great good liking of Cæſar, and the rather, becauſe he had ſent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colour of his warre againſt the PARTHIANS. But Cæſar though he ſmelt him wherefore he ſent for his ſouldiers, returned them home with liberall reward. About that time, Pompey fell ſicke at NAPLES of a dangerous diſeaſe, whereof notwithſtanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS thereupon, by perſuaſion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefeſt men of their citie: did ſacrifice to the gods for his recouerie. The like did alſo their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ranne ſo generally through all ITALY, that there was no citie or towne (great or ſmall) but made open feaſt and reioycing for many daies together. Beſides, the infinite number of people was ſuch, that went to meete him out of all partes: that there was not place enough for them all, but the high waies, cities, townes and ports of the ſea, were all full of people, feaſting and ſacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouerie. Diuerſe alſo went to meete him, crowned with garlands, and ſo did attend on him, caſting noſegaies and flowers vpon him. Thus was his Iorney the nobleſt ſight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought alſo, that this was the chiefeſt cauſe of the beginning of the ciuill warres. For he fell into ſuch a pride, and glorious conceit of himſelfe, with the exceeding ioy he tooke to ſee himſelfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to proſper, he grew too bolde in deſpiſing of Cæſars power, as though he ſtood in no need of other power or care to withſtand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more eaſily, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions back againe which he had lent vnto Cæſar, reproching much his doings which he had done there, and giuing out many ſoule wordes againſt Cæſar. For he ſaid, that Pompey knew not his owne ſtrength and authoritie, that would ſeeke to make himſelfe ſtrong, by other power againſt him: conſidering that he might ouercome him with his owne legions, he ſhould bring with him, ſo ſoone as they ſaw but Pompey in the face, ſuch ill will did Cæſars owne ſouldiers beare him, and were maruellous deſirous beſides to ſee himſelf. Theſe flattering tales ſo puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into ſuch a ſecuritie and truſt of himſelfe, that he mocked them to ſcorne which were affraide of warres. And to thoſe alſo which ſaid, that if Cæſar came to ROME, they ſaw not how they could reſiſt his power: he ſmilingly aunſwered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for as oft as ſaid he as I do but ſtampe with my foote vpon the ground of ITALY, I ſhall bring men enough out of euery corner, both footemen and horſemen. In the meane time, Cæſar gathered force ſtill vpon him, and thenceforth drew neerer vnto ITALY, and ſent of his ſouldiers daily to ROME to be preſent at the election of the magiſtrates, and many of them that were in office, office, he wanne with money: amongeſt whom, was Paul, one of the Conſuls, whom hee wanne of his ſide, by meanes of a thouſand fiue hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he diſcharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antony alſo, who for Curioes ſake, was diſcharged likewiſe for part of the debt which Curio ought, being alſo bound as him ſelfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or Centurion ſent from Ceſar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderſtanding that the councell would not prolong Ceſars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pummell of his ſword: well ſaid he, this ſhall giue it him. So, to be ſhort, all that was done and ſaied, tended to this end. Notwithſtanding, the petitions and requeſtes that Curio made in Ceſars behalfe, ſeemed ſomewhat more reaſonable for the people: for he requeſted one of the two, either to make Pompey to put downe his army, or elſe to licence Ceſar to haue his army as well as he. For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of them ſelues: or elſe being both of like ſtrength, neither of both would ſeeke any alteration, fearing one an other, but would content them ſelues either of them with their owne. Or otherwiſe, he that ſhould weaken the one, and ſtrengthen the other: ſhould double his power whom he feared. Thereto very whotly replied the Conſull Marcellus, calling Ceſar, theefe, and ſaied that he ſhould be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not diſperſe his army. This notwithſtanding, in fine Curio, Antony, and Piſo, procured that the Senate ſhould decide the matter. For, ſaid he, all thoſe that would haue Ceſar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his: let them ſtand on the one ſide. Thereupon the moſt part of them ſtoode at one ſide. Then he bad them againe come away from them, that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained only but two and twenty that ſtoode for Pompey: and all the reſt went of Curioes ſide. Then Curio looking aloft for ioy of the victory, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribune faction, with ſhoutes of ioy and clapping of handes, and infinite noſegayes and garlands of flowers throwen vppon him. Pompey was not then preſent to ſee the Senators good will towardes him: becauſe by the law, ſuch as haue commaundement ouer ſouldiers, can not enter into ROME. Notwithſtanding Marcellus ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he would not ſtand trifling hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that tenne legions were already paſſed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes againſt them: and that he would ſend a man vnto them, that ſhould defend their countrey well enough. Straight they chaunged apparell in ROME, as their manner was in a common calamity. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went to him, and tolde him openly: Pompey, I commaund thee to helpe thy countrey with that army thou haſt already, and alſo to leauy more to aid thee. The like ſpeach did Lentulus vſe vnto him, who was appointed one of the Conſuls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leauy ſouldiers in ROME and to bill them, ſome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heauy hearts, and the moſt part of them cried, peace, peace. Antony alſo, againſt the Senates minde, red a letter vnto the people ſent from Ceſar containing certaine offers and reaſonable requeſtes, to draw the common peoples affection towardes him. For his requeſt was, that Pompey and he ſhould both of them reſigne their gouernments, and ſhould diſmiſſe their armies to make all well, referring them ſelues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Conſulſhippe, did not aſſemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CILICIA, practiſed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Ceſar ſhould leaue GAVLE, and all the reſt of his army, reſeruing onely two legions and the gouernment of ILLYRIA, attending his ſecond Conſulſhippe. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Ceſars friendes were contented to graunt that hee ſhould haue but one of his legions. But Lentulus ſpake againſt it, and Cato cried out on the other ſide alſo, that Pompey was deceiued, and they both. So all treatie of peace was cut off. In the meane time, newes came to ROME, that Ceſar had wonne ARIMINVM, a faire great city of ITALY, and that hee came directly to ROME with a great power. But that was not true. For he came but with three thouſand horſe, and fiue thouſand footemen, and would not tary for the reſt of his army that was yet on the other ſide of the mountaines in GAVLE, but made haſt rather to ſurpriſe his enemies vpon the ſodaine, being afraied and in garboyle, not looking for him so soone: rather then to giue them time to be prouided and to fight with him when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuer side of Rubicon, (which was the vtmost confine of the prouince he had in charge towardes ITALY) he stayed sodainely, weying with him selfe the great enterprise he tooke in hand. At the last, as men that being of a maruellous height from the ground do hedlong throw themselues down, closing of their eyes, and withdrawing their mindes from the thought of the daunger: euen so crying out these wordes only vnto them that were by, in the Greeke tongue, ἀναῤῥιπτω κύβον: in english, let the die be cast (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our prouerbe, to set all on six and seuen) he passed ouer with his army. Now, the newes of his comming being caried to ROME, they were in such a maruellous feare, as the like was neuer seene. For all the Senate ranne immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other magistrates of the city fled vnto him also. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to resist them, he answered him, faltring somewhat in his speach: that he had the two legions ready which Cæsar sent him backe againe: and that he thought with the number of them which hee had leauied, in hast, he should make vp the number of thirty thousand fighting men. Then Tullus cried out openly: ah, thou hast mocked vs Pompey: & thereupon gaue order they should send ambassadors vnto Cæsar. There was one Phaonius in the company, who otherwise was no ill man, sauing that he was somewhat too bolde, thinking to counterfeate Catoes plaine manner of speach: he bad Pompey then stampe his foote vppon the ground, and make those souldiers come which he had promised them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him also, what he had propheciedbefore hand of Cæsar, he answered him againe: in deed thou hast propheciedmore truly then I, but I haue dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they should make him lieutenant general of ROME with full and absolute power to command all, saying that the selfe same men which doe the greatest mischiefe, know best also how to remedy the same. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernment of that country: and also euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in armes, no man knew what was best to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts: and those on the other side that were within ROME, went out as fast, and forsooke the city in this trouble and disorder. That which might serue being willing to obey, was found very weake: and that on the other side which by disobedience did hurt, was too strong and il to be gouerned by the magistrats, hauing law to command. For there was no possibility to pacifie their feare, neither would they suffer Pompey to offer things as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancy, euen as hee found himself grieued, afraied, or in doubt, and in one day they were in diuers minds. Pompey could heare no thing of certainty of his enemies. For some, one while would bring him newes one way, and then againe an other way: and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he saw the tumult and confusion so great at ROME, as there was no meanes to pacifie it: he commaunded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behinde, that he would take them for Cæsars friends, and so at night departed out of the city. Then the two Consuls fled also, without doing any sacrifice to the goddes, as they were wont to do before they went to make any warres. So Pompey, euen in his greatest trouble and most daunger, might thinke him selfe happy to haue euery mans good will as he had. For, though diuers misliked the cause of this warre, yet no man hated the Captaine: but there were many found that could not forsake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæsar was come to ROME, who possessing the city, spake very gently vnto all them he found there, and pacified their feare: sauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, because he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter speach also, saying: that it was not so hard a thing for him to doe it, as to speake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to serue his turne, he tooke vpon him to follow Pompey, thinking to driue him out of ITALY, before that his army hee had in SPAINE should come to him. Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten some shippes together: he made the two Consuls presently imbarke with thirty ensignes of footemen, which he sent beyond the sea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he sent his father in law Scipio, and Cneus Pompey his sonne, into SYRIA, to prouide him ships. Him selfe on the other side, fortified the rampers of the city, and placed the lightest souldiers he had vpon the walles, and commanded the BRVNDVSIANS not to stur out of their houses: and further, he cast trenches within the city, at the end of the streetes in diuerse places, and filled those trenches with sharpe pointed stakes, sauing two streetes onely, which went vnto the hauen. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the rest of his souldiers at his pleasure, he sodainly lifting vp a signe into the aire, to giue them warning which he had left to gard the rampers: they straight came to him with speede, and quickly receiuing them into his shippes, he weied ancker, and hoised saile. Cæsar perceiuing the wals naked without ward, he straight mistrusted that Pompey was fled: who hasting after him, had almost run vpon the sharpe stakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSIANS giuen him warning of them. So he staied, and ranne not ouerthwart the city, but fetched a compasse about to goe to the hauen: where he found that all the shippes were vnder saile, two shippes onely excepted, vppon the which were left a few souldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the best stratagems of warre that euer he vsed. Notwithstanding, Cæsar maruelled much, that he being in a strong citie, and looking for his army to come out of SPAINE, and being master of the sea besides, that he would euer forsake ITALY. Cicero also reproued him, for that he rather followed Themistocles counsel, then Pericles: considering that the troublesome time was rather to be likened vnto Pericles, then Themistocles time. Yea Cæsar himselfe shewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeyes frends, he sent him vnto Pompey at BRVNDVSIVM, to offer him reasonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, & sailed away with him. By this means, Cæsar in three score daies being lord of al ITALY without any bloud shed, he was very desirous to follow with speede after Pompey. But because he had no ships ready, he let him goe, and hasted towards SPAINE, to ioyne Pompeys army there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane space, had gotten a maruellous great power together both by sea and by land. His army by sea was wonderfull. For he had fiue hundred good ships of war, and of galleys, foists, and pinnases, an infinit number. By land, he had all the flower of the horsemen of ROME, and of all ITALY, to the number of seuen thousand horse, all rich men of great houses, and valiant minds. But his footmen, they were men of all sorts, and raw souldiers vntrained, whom Pompey cõtinually exercised, lying at the city of BERROEE, not sitting idlely, but taking paine, as if he had bin in the prime of his youth. Which was to great purpose to incorage others: for Pompey being eight and fifty yeare old, fight a foote armed at al peeces, and then a horseback, quickly to draw out his sword while his horse was in his full career, and easily to put it vp againe, and to throw his dart from him, not onely with such agility to hit pointe blacke, but also with strength to cast it such a way from him, that few young men could doe the like. Thither came diuers, kings, princes, and great lordes of countries, and yeelded them selues vnto him: and of ROMAINE captaines that had borne office, he had of them about him, the number of a whole Senat. Amongst them came vnto him Labienus also, who before was Cæsars frend, and had alwaies bene with him in his warres in GAVLE. There came vnto him also, Brutus, the sonne of that Brutus which was slaine in GAVLE, a valiant man, and which had neuer spoken vnto Pompey vntil that day, because he took him for a murderer of his father: but then willingly followed him as defendor of the liberty of ROME. Cicero him selfe also, though he had both written and giuen counsell to the contrary, thought it a shame to him not to be amongest the number of them that would hazard their liues for defence of their countrey. There came vnto him also Tidius Sextius euen into MACEDON, notwithstanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legs: whom others laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pompey saw him, he rose and went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their goodwils vnto him, when such old men as he, chose rather to be with him in daunger, then at home with safety. Hereupon they sate in councell, and following Catoes opinion, decreede that they should put no citizen of ROME to death but in battell, and should sacke no city that was subiect to the Empire of ROME the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the wars, either becauſe they dwelt far off, or els for that they were ſo poore, as otherwiſe they were not regarded: did yet both in deede and word fauour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemy both to the gods and men, that wiſhed not Pompey victory. Cæſar alſo ſhewed him ſelfe very mercifull and curteous, where he ouercame. For when he had won all Pompey's army that was in SPAINE, he ſuffered the captaines that were taken to go at liberty, and only reſerued the ſouldiers. Then comming ouer the ALPES againe, he paſſed through all ITALY and came to the city of BRVNDVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there paſſing ouer the ſea, he went vnto the city of ORICVM, and landed there. Now Cæſar hauing Vibius, one of Pompey's familiar friends with him, whom he had taken priſoner: he ſent him vnto Pompey to pray him againe that they might meete, and both of them diſperſe their armies within three daies, & being reconciled (giuing their faith one to an other) ſo to returne into ITALY like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that theſe were new deuiſes to intrap him. Thereupon he ſtraightly went down to the ſea, and tooke all the places of ſtrength by the ſea ſide, ſafely to lodge his campe in, and all the ports, creekes and harbors for ſhips to lie in rode: ſo that what winde ſo euer blew on the skie, it ſerued his turne, to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Cæſar on the other ſide was ſo diſtreſſed both by ſea and by land, that he was driuē to procure battell, and to aſſaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: in whom moſt times he euer had the better in all skirmiſhes, ſauing once, when he was in danger to haue loſt all his army. For Pompey had valiantly repulſed his men, and made them flie, and had ſlain two thouſand of them in the field: but he durſt not enter pel mel with them into their campe as they fled. Whereupon Cæſar ſaied to his friends, that his enemy had wōn the victory that day, if he had knowen how to ouercome. This victory put Pompeys men in ſuch courage, that they would needs hazard battell. And Pompey him ſelfe alſo though he wrote letters vnto ſtrange kings, captains, and cities of his confederacy, as if he had already won all: was yet afraied to fight an other battell, thinking it better by traict of time, and diſtreſſe of victuals, to ouercome him. For Cæſars men being old and expert ſouldiers, and wont euer to haue the victory when they fought together: he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kinde of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and alſo to fortifie and intrench them ſelues, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hand, and fight it out. But notwithſtanding that Pompey had before perſwaded him not to be quiet, and not to ſturre, perceiuing that after this laſt bickering Cæſar being ſcanced with victuals raiſed his campe, and departed thence to goe into THESSALY, through the country of the ATHAMANIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Cæſar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, let vs returne home againe into ITALY. And others alſo ſent their friends and ſeruants before to ROME, to hire them houſes neare the market place: intending when they came thither to ſue for offices in the common wealth. Some there were alſo that in a iollity would needs take ſhip, and ſaile into the Ile of LESBOS, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had ſent thither) to cary her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon aſſembling the councell, Africanus thought it beſt to winne ITALY, for that was the chiefeſt marke to be ſhot at in this warre: for whoſoeuer obtained that, had ſtraight SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAINE, and GAVLE at commaundement. Furthermore, that it was a diſhonour to Pompey (which in reaſon ſhould touch him aboue all things) to ſuffer their countrey to be in ſuch cruell bondage and ſubiection vnto ſlaues and flatterers of tyrants, offering it ſelfe as it were into their handes. But Pompey neither thought it honorable for him, once againe to flie from Cæſar, and to make him follow him, ſith fortune had giuen him oportunity to haue Cæſar in chaſe: nor lawfull alſo before the gods, to forſake his father in law Scipio, and many other alſo that had bene Conſuls, diſperſed abroad in GREECE and THESSALY, which ſhould immediatly fall into Cæſars hands, with all their riches and armies they had. Furthermore, he ſaid, that they had care enough for the city of ROME, which drew the wars farthеſt off from them: ſo as, they remaining ſafe and quiet at home, (neither hearing nor feeling the miſery of warres) might in the end peaceably receiue and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cæſar, being determined not to giue him battell, but to beſiege him, & only to compaſſe him in, that being being neare vnto him, and so to cut him off from victuals. There was also an other reason that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech given out among the ROMAINE knights, that so soone as euer they had ouercome Cæsar, they should also bring Pompey to be a priuate man againe. Some say therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwards imploy Cato in any greater matters of waight in all this warre, but, when he followed Cæsar, he left him captaine of his army, to keepe his carriage by sea, fearing that so soone as Cæsar were once ouercome, he would make him straight also resigne his authority. Pompey following Cæsar in this maner, faire and softly, they cried out vpon him, that he made no warre with Cæsar, but against his country and the Senat, because he might be still an heire: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his seruants and guard about him, which should rule and commaund the world. Furthermore, Domitius Enobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kings, made him much to be enuied. Pharnax also mocked him as much as the other, that spake most boldest: for hee went crying vp and downe, my maisters, I giue you warning, you are like to eate no figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius also, he that had lost the army which he had in SPAINE, and was also suspected for a traitour, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I maruaile, said he, that they which accuse mee, doe not lustely goe to finde him out, whom they call the marchaunt and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him presently. With these and many such other lewd speaches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not deny his friendes any thing) to follow their vaine hope and desires, and to forsake his owne wise determination: the which thing, no good shippe maister, and much lesse a chiefe and soueraigne captaine, ouer so many nations and so great armies, should haue suffered and consented vnto. Now, he that did alwaies commend the physitions, that would not follow the fond desire of the sicke patients: was him selfe contented to obey the worst part of his army, fearing their displeasure, where their life or health stoode in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wise men, and in their wittes, who walking vp and downe their campe, did already sue to be Consuls and Prætors: considering that Lentulus, Domitius, and Scipio, were at strife together, making friendes to be high Bishoppe, (which office Cæsar had) as if they should haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cæsar and his army: who had taken a thousand townes by assault, had subdued aboue three hundred seuerall nations, and had wonne infinite battels of the GERMAINES and GAVLES, and was neuer ouercome: had also taken a million of men prisoners, and had likewise slaine so many at diuers battels. All this notwithstanding, they of Pompeys side still being importunate of him, & troubling him in this sort: in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a councell. There Labienus, generall of the horsemen standing vp, sware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like oath all the rest did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honor him, made a maruellous great clapping of their handes: and that he him selfe did set forth the temple of Venus the conqueror with many spoiles. This vision partly put him in good corage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraied, because Cæsars family was discended from this goddesse Venus, that his dreame did signifie, that he should haue the honour of the victory, with the spoiles he should winne of him. Besides all this, there ran sodaine fearefull noises and tumults in his campe without any apparant cause, that waked all the campe vppon it. At the fourth watche, when the watch is renued in the morning, there was seene a maruellous great light ouer Cæsars camp, and they were all at rest. Of that, there came as it were a torch of a burning fire, and fell in Pompeys campe. The which Cæsar him selfe said he saw, when he went to search the watch. At the breake of the day, Cæsar being determined to raise his campe, and to goe to the city of SCOTVSA, as his souldiers were busie about ouerthrowing of their tentes, and sending away their bagges and baggage before: there came skoutes vnto him, that brought him word they saw a great deale of armour and weapon caried to and fro in their enemies campe, and heard a noise and bussling besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After these came in other skowtes, that brought word also that their voward was already set in battell raye. Then Cæsar sayed, that the day was now come they had longed for so sore, and that they should now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gaue order presently that they should put out the redde coates or armes vpon his tente, which was the signe all the ROMAINES vsed to shew that they would fight. The souldiers seing them out, left their cariage and tentes and with great shoutes of ioye ranne to arme themselues.

The Captaines of euery band also, bestowed euery man in such place as he should fight, and so they countryed themselues into battell raye, without any tumult or disorder, as quietly as if they should haue entred into a daunce. Pompey himselfe ledde the left wing of his armye gainst Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in lawe being right gainst Domitius Caluinus. The left wing also was led by Lucius Domitius Aenobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes, for all the horsemen were placed on that side, to distresse Cæ- sar if they could, that was directly against them: and to ouerthrowe the tenth legion that was so much accounted of, being the valianteste souldiers the enemie had in all his armye amongst the which Cæsar did euer vse to fight in person. Cæsar then seing the leste wing of his enemies so strong with the gard of the horsemen, and being afrayed of the brightnes of their armor: brought forward six ensignes for supply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion, commanding them that no man should stur, least their enemies should discouer them.
And furthermore, when the horsemen of the enemies should come to giue charge vpon them, that then they should runne with speed on the one side of the formost rancks, and not to throw their dartes farre from them, as the valianteste souldiers are wont to do, to come to the swords the sooner: but to throw them vpwards into their enemies eyes and faces. For, sayd he, these braue fellowes and fine daunters, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cæsars deuise at that time. Pompey being a horsebacke, rode vp and downe to consider the ordinance of both battels: and perceiuing that his enemies stood still in their rankes, looking for the signall of battell, and that his owne battell on the other side waued vp and downe disorderly, as men vnskilfull in warres: he was afrayd they would flie before they were charged.
Thereupon he straightly commaunded them in the voward, that they should steadily keepe their rankes, and standing close together should so defend themselues, receiuing the charge of the enemy. But Cæsar disliked of that deuise, for thereby, sayd he, the force of their blowes was lessened, and in withholding them from giuing the charge, he not only tooke away that courage which the assailant carieth with him that commeth with furie: but made them moreo-uer faint harted, in receiuing the charge of the enemies. In Cæsars armie, there were about two and twentie thousand fighting men: and in Pompeyes armie, somewhat aboue twise as many.
Now, when the word of battell was giuen of either side, and that the trumpets did sound the allarme: euery man beganne to looke to himselfe. But a fewe of the chiefest of the ROMAINS, and certaine GRECIANS that were there also out of the set battell, perceiuing the imminent danger, began to bethinke them, to what passe the ambition and wil full contention betwene these two men, had brought the state of ROME. For the weapons of kinsemen, the bands of bretheren, the ensignes all alike, the flower of so many valiant men of one citie, did serue for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prickt forward with couetousnes, is quite blind and without reason. For if they could haue beene contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered: the greatest and best part of the world, both by sea and by land, was subiect vnto them. Or otherwise, if they could not haue quenched their vnstiable desire of victorie and triumph, they had occasion of warre enough offered them against the PAR-THIANS & GERMAINS. Furthermore they had enough to do besides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and withall, they had had an honest colour to haue cloked their ambitious desires, if it had bene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horsemen of SCYTHIA, or arrowes of PARTHIA, or riches of Indians, could haue abidden the power of three score and tenne thousand ROMAINE souldiers, and specially being led by two so famous Captaines, as Pompey, and Cæsar? whose names, these strange and far nations vnderstood long before the name of the ROMAINS: so great were their victories, hauing conquered so many wilde and barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one against the other, not regarding their honor which made them so ambitious: did not spare their own country, who had vntill that time remained vnuincible, both in fame and prowes. For, the alliance that was made betwene them, the loue of Iulia, & marying with her, was suspected frō the beginning to be but a deceit, & a pledge as it were of a conspiracie made betwene them, for their priuate benefit, more then for any true friendship. Now whē the fields of PHARSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horse and armor, and that the signall of battell was giuen on either side: the first man of Cæsars army that aduanced forward to giue charge, was Caius Crassinius a captaine of sixe score and fiue men, to performe a great promise which he had made vnto Cæsar. For Cæsar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, seeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the successe of this battell? Crassinius holding vp his right hand vnto him, couragiously cryed: Oh Cæsar, thine is the victorie, and this day thou shalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remēbring these words, he brake out of the troupes, and many following after him, ranne amongst the middest of his enemies. Straight they came to the sword, and made great slaughter. But he pressing forwarde still, one with a dart ran him through the mouth, that the swords point came through at his neck. Thereupon Crassinius being slain, the battel was equall. Pompey did not make his left wing march out euenly, but staied, and cast his eyes abroad to see what his horsemen would doe, the which had alreadie deuided their companies, meaning to compasse in Cæsar, and to make the small number of horsemen which he had before him to giue backe vpon the squadron of his footemen. On the other side, as soone as Cæsar had giuen the signall of battell, his horsemen retired backe a litle, and the sixe enseignes which he had placed secretly behinde them, (being three thousand fighting men) ranne sodainely to assaile the enemie vpon the flancke, and when they came neere vnto the horsemen, they threw the points of their dartes vpwardes according to Cæsars commaundement, and hyt the young gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfull to fight, and least of all looking for such maner of fight: had not the hearts to defend themselues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, & clapping their hands on their faces, shamefully fled. They being ouerthrowen, Cæsars men made no account to follow them, but went and gaue charge vppon the battell of footemen, in that place specially where they had no guard of horsemen, whereby they might the easilliet be compassed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the vowarde also by the fourth legion, perceiuing themselues (contrarie to their expectation) compassed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue enuironed them: they could make no longer resistance. They also being likewise driuen to flie, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, and coniectured the flying of his horsemen: what minde he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went straight into his campe, and spake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verses to this effect.

In this estate Pompey entred into his tent, and sate him downe there a great while, and spake neuer a word: vntill such time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he said no more: but what, euen into our campe? and so rising vp, he put a gowne on his backe euen fit for his misfortune, and secretly stale out of the campe. The other legions also fled: and great slaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their seruantes that guarded the campe. For Asinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæsars side) that there were slaine onely but sixe thousand souldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Cæsars souldiers then found plainly the madnes & vanity of Pompeys men. For, all their tents and pauilions were full of nosegayes and garlands of mirtle, and their couches al couered with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, & men prepared readie to do sacrifice for ioy, rather then to arme themselues to fight. Thus went they to battel, caried away with this vaine and foolish hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way from his campe, he forsooke his horse, hauing a very few with him: & perceiuing that no man pursued him, he went a foot faire and softly, his head full of such thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure and thirty yeares space together, was wont continually to carie victorie away, and beganne then euen in his last cast, to proue what it was to flie, and to be ouercome: and who thought then with himselfe, how in one houres space he had lost the honor and riches which he had gotten in so many foughten fields and battels, wherby he was not long before followed and obeyed of so many thousand men of warre, of so many footemen, and of such a great fleete of shippes on the sea, and then to goe as he did in such poore estate, and with so small a traine, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Then when he was passed the citie of LARISSA, and comming to the vallie of Tempé: there being a thirst, he fell downe on his belly and dranke of the riuer. Then rising vp againe, he went his way thence and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle bote vppon the riuer, and tooke with him free men with him that were about him: and as for the slaues, he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to goe to Cæsar, and not to be affraide. Thus rowing vp and down the shore side, in this litle bote, he spyed a great shippe of burden in the maine sea, riding at anker, which was readie to weigh anker, and to saile away. The master of the shippe was a ROMAINE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knewe him by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he sawe Pompey speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in miserie. So, he told this dreame vnto the mariners which sailed with him (as men commonly vse to do, especially when they dreame of such weightie matters, and being at leasure withall) and at the very instant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he saw a litle bote on the riuer rowing towardes them, and that there were men in it that shooke their clokes at them, and held vp their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp, knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his bote, and gaue him his hande, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he receiued him into his shippe, and all those he would haue with him: and then hoised saile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer with them, that beckened and made signes to receiue them: which they did. At supper time, the master of the shippe, made readie such meate as he had abord. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of himselfe: ranne vnto him, washed him, and annointed him: and afterwardes continued still to waite vpon him, and to doe such seruice about him, as seruants do to their masters, euen to washing of his feete, and making ready of his supper. When a simple man saw him, that could no skill of seruice, he said:

Good gods, how euery thing becommeth noble men?

Pompey passing then by the city of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Ile of LESBOS, to goe fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne being then in the citie of MITYLENE. There hauing cast out his ancker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore & sent him to the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined: the citie of DYRRACHIVM. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the hart so much as to salute her, but letting her vnderstand rather by his teares then wordes, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, she must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one shippe only, and none of his but borowed. The young Ladie hearing these newes, fell downe in a sound before him, and neither spake nor sturred of long time: but after she was come to her selfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, she went with speede through the city vnto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, & imbraced her. But she sincking vnder him, fell downe and said: Out alas, woe worth my hard fortune, o thing (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poore shippe, who before thou married'st thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to saile these seas with fiue hundred ships. Alas, w at thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leaue me to cursed fate and my wicked destenie: sith my selfe is cause of all this thy cull? Alas, how happy a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead before I heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched Parthians slew? And how wise a woman had I bene, if (according to my determination) I had killed my selfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto Pompey the great? It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou hast knowen a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, because she hath continued longer with me then her maner is. But since we are borne men, we must patiently beare these troubles, and proue fortune againe. For it is no impossible matter for vs againe to come into prosperitie out of this present miserie, as to fall out of late prosperitie into present calamitie. When Cornelia heard him say so, she sent backe into the citie for her stuffe & family. The Mitylenians also came openly to salute Pompey, and praied him to come into the citie, and to refresh himselfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counsell to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Cæsar was a iust man, and of courteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came amõg the citizens also to see him: made his complaint vnto him, and reasoned a litle with him about di-uine prouidence. Cratippus courteously yeelded vnto him, putting him still in better hope, fearing least he would haue growen too hot & troublesome, if he would haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had bene in his doings? And Cratippus might haue answered him, that for the ill gouernment of the common wealth at Rome, it was of necessity that it should fall into the handes of a soue-raigne prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might then haue asked him: how, and whereby Pompey couldest thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadst ouercome Cæsar, that thou wouldest haue vsed thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, referre them to the goddes as it plea-seth them. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoised saile, and landed no where, but compelled to take fresh acates and water. The first citie he came vnto, was Attalia in the country of Pamphylia. Thither came to him certain gallies out of Cilicia, & many soul-diers also, insomuch he had a three score Senators of Rome againe in his company. Then, vnderstanding that his army by sea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his souldiers after the ouerthrowe, whom he had transported with him into A-fricke: he lamented, and complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not suffred him to helpe himselfe with his other force wherin he was the stronger:

and that he kept not still neere vnto his army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might presently haue prepared to his power ready by sea, to haue resisted his enemy. To confesse truth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all this warre, neither did Cæsar put foorth a better deuise, then to make his enemie fight farre from his army by sea. Thus Pompey being
ties. To others, he went himselfe in person also to require money, wherewith he manned and rigged some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the sodaine approach of his enemy, least he should preuent him before he could put any reasonable force in readinesse for to resist him: he thought himselfe what place he might best retyre vnto for his most safetie. When he had considered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the Romaines that could saue and defend them. And for other strange realmes, he thought Parthia aboue all other, was the best place to receiue them into at that present, hauing so small power as they had: and that was better able to helpe & aide them with more power then they. Other of his councell were of mind to go into Africke, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes Lesbian said, he thought it a great folly, to leaue Ægypt which was but three daies sailing from thence, and king Ptolomy, being but lately come to mans state, and bound vnto Pompey for the late friendshippe and fa-
first, and vnfaithfullest nation in the world, & not to proue the modesty of a Romaine, that had bene his father in law, whose prosperity if he could haue endured, he might haue bene the gladdest man: and now to put himselfe to Arsaces good will, who could not away with Crassus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill part also, for him to go carie his young wife of the

hauing a very few with him: & perceiuing that no man pursued him, he went a foot faire and softly, his head full of such thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure and thirty yeares space together, was wont continually to carie victorie away, and beganne then euen in his last cast, to proue what it was to flie, and to be ouercome: and who thought then with himselfe, how in one houres space he had lost the honor and riches which he had gotten in so many foughten fields and battels, wherby he was not long before followed and obeyed of so many thousand men of warre, of so many horsemen, and of such a great fleete of shippes on the sea, and then to goe as he did in such poore estate, and with so small a traine, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the citie of LARISSA, and comming to the vallie of Tempé: there being a thirst, he fell downe on his belly and dranke of the riuer. Then rising vp againe, he went his way thence and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle bote vppon the riuer, and tooke three free men with him that were about him: and as for the slaues, he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to goe to Cæsar, and not to be affraide. Thus rowing vp and down the shore side, in this litle bote, he spyed a great shippe of burden in the maine sea, riding at anker, which was readie to weigh anker, and to saile away. The master of the shippe was a ROMAINE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knewe him by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he sawe Pompey speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in miserie. So, he had told this dreame vnto the mariners which sailed with him (as men commonly vse to do, specially when they dreame of such weightie matters, and being at leasure withall) and at the verie instant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he saw a litle bote on the riuer rowing towardes them, and that there were men in it that shooke their clokes at them, and helde out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp, knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his bote, and gaue him his hande, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he receiued him into his shippe, and all those he would haue with him: and then hoised saile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made signes to receiue them: which they did. At supper time, the master of the shippe, made readie such meate as he had abord. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of himselfe: ranne vnto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwardes continued still to waite vpon him, and to doe such seruice about him, as seruants do to their masters, euen to washing of his feete, and making ready of his supper. When a simple man saw him, that could no skill of seruice, he said:

Pompey passing then by the city of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Ile of LESBOS, to goe fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne being then in the citie of MITYLENE. There hauing cast out his ancker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore & sent him to the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the citie of DYRRACHIVM. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the hart so much as to salute her, but letting her vnderstand rather by his teares then wordes, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, she must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one shippe only, and none of his but borowed. The young Ladie hearing these newes, fell downe in a sound before him, and neither spake nor sturred of long time: but after she was come to her selfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, she went with speede through the city vnto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, & imbraced her. But she sincking vnder him, fell downe and said: Out alas, woe worth my hard fortune, not thine (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poore shippe, who before thou marriedst thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to saile these seas with fiue hundred ships. Alas, why art

The meeting of Pompey & his wife Cornelia. The words of Cornelia vnto Pompey.

art thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leaue me to cursed fate and my wicked destenie: sith my selfe is cause of all this thy euill? Alas, how happy a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead before I heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched
had killed my selfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto
her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou hast knowen a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, because she hath continued longer with me then her maner is. But since we
out of late prosperitie into present calamitie. When Cornelia heard him say so, she sent backe into the citie for her stuffe & family. The MITYLENIANS also came openly to salute Pompey, and praied him to come into the citie, and to refresh himselfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue
a courteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came amõg the
wouldest thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadst ouercome Cæsar, that thou wouldest haue vsed
country of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certain gallies out of CILICIA, & many soul-diers also, insomuch he had a three score Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then, vnderstanding that his army by sea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his souldiers after the ouerthrowe, whom he had transported with him into A-FRICKE: he lamented, and complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not suffred him to helpe himselfe with his other force wherin he was the stronger:
yet presently haue prepared to his power ready by sea, to haue resisted his enemy. To confesse a truth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all this warre, neither did Cæsar put foorth a better deuise, then to make his enemie fight farre from his army by sea. Thus Pompey being
armed some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the sodaine approach of his enemy, least he should preuent him before he could put any reasonable force in readinesse for to resist him: he bethought himselfe what place he might best retyre vnto for his most safetie. When he had
and defend them. And for other strange realmes, he thought PARTHIA aboue all other, was
of mind to go into AFRICKE, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN said, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three daies sailing from thence, and king Ptolomy, (being but lately come to mans state, and bound vnto Pompey for the late friendshippe and fa-
vilest, and vnfaithfullest nation in the world, & not to proue the modesty of a ROMAINE, that had bene his father in law, whose prosperity if he could haue endured, he might haue bene the chiefest man: and now to put himselfe to Arsaces good will, who could not away with Crassus

noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawful for the to vse what villany and insolency they list to any. For, admit she haue no villany offered her by them: yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke she might haue bene dishonoured, they hauing her in their power to doe it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this only that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it seemeth that Pompeys counsell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SYRIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his traine imbarked also, some into gallies, and others into marchants shippes of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without daunger.

When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolomie was in the city of PELVSIVM with his army, making warre against his sister: he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arriuall, and to intreate him to receiue him. King Ptolomy was then but a young man, insomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He assembled a councell of the chiefest and wisest men of the court, who had such credite & authoritie as it pleased him to giue them. They being assembled, he commanded euery man in the king's name to say his mind touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king should receiue him or not. It was a miserable thing to see Pothinus, an eunuch of the kings, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hyred schoolemaster to teach the young king rethoricke, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN to consult among themselues what they should doe with Pompey the great. These were the chiefest councellors of all his eunuches, and of those that had brought him vp. Now did Pompey ride at ancker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolution of this councell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for they would not haue receiued him: the other also, that he should be receiued. But the Rethoritian Theodotus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, said he, if we receiue him, we shall haue Cæsar our enemy, & Pompey our Lord: and if they do deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame them for refusing of him, and Cæsar for not keeping of him. Therefore, this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby they should winne the good will of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other: and some say moreouer, that hee added this mocke withall: a dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselues gaue Achillas commission to doe it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge afore time vnder Pompey) and Saluius an other Centurion also, with three or foure souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys gallie, about whom were at that time, the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in Princely shew and manner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing so few men come to them in a fisher bote: they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, & counselled Pompey to returne backe, and to launch againe into the sea, being out of the daunger of the hurling of a dart. In the meane time, the fisher bote drew neere, and Septimius rose & saluted Pompey in the ROMAN tongue, by the name of Imperator, as much as soueraigne Captaine: and Achillas also spake to him in the Greeke tongue, and bad him come into his bote, because that by the shore side there was a great deale of mudde and sande bankes, so that his gallie should haue no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shore besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company would haue altered their minds, they could not haue told how to haue escaped: and furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had giuen them therer occasion to haue executed his crueltie. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end: he commanded two Centurions to go downe before him into the ÆGYPTIANS bote, and Philip one of his slaues infranchised, with an other slaue called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receiue him into his bote, he turned him to his wife and sonne, and said these verses of Sophocles vnto them:

The deliberation of the AEgyptians, for the receiuing of Pompey. Theodotus perswaded them to kill Pompey. A dead man biteth not. Achillas appointed to kill Pompey.

How Pompey was receiued into AEgypt.

The man that into Court comes free, Muſt there in ſtate of bondage be.

These were the last words he spake vnto his people, when he left his owne gally & went into the ÆGYPTIANS bote. The land being a great way off from his gally, when he saw neere a man man in the bote ſpeake friendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he ſaid vnto him: me thinkes my friend I ſhould know thee, for that thou haſt ſerued with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no anſwere, nor ſhewed him any courteſie. Pompey ſeeing that no man ſpake to him, tooke a litle booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he ment to make vnto king Ptolomy, & beganne to read it. When they came neere the ſhore, Cornelia with her ſeruants and friendes about her, ſtoode vp in her ſhippe in great feare, to ſee what ſhould become of Pompey. So, ſhe hoped well, when ſhe ſawe many of the kings people on the ſhore, comming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honor him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philip his hande to ariſe more eaſily, Septimius came firſt behind him and thruſt him through with his ſword. Next vnto him alſo, Salvius and Achillas drew out their ſwords in like maner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his handes and hidde his face, and manly abidde the wounds they gaue him, coldly ſighing a litle. Thus being nine and fiftie yeare olde, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at ancker in their ſhippes, when they ſaw him murthered, gaue ſuch a fearfull crie, that it was heard to the ſhore: then weying vp their ankers with ſpeed, they hoiſed ſaile, and departed their way, hauing winde at will that blew a luſty gale, as ſoone as they had gotten the maine ſea. The ÆGYPTIANS which prepared to rowe after them, when they ſaw they were paſt their reach, and vnpoſſible to be ouertaken: they let them go. Then hauing ſtriken off Pompeys head, they threwe his bodie ouer borde, for a miſerable ſpectacle to all thoſe that were deſirous to ſee him. Philip his infranchiſed bondman remained euer by it, vntill ſuch time as the ÆGYPTIANS had ſeene it their bellies full. Then hauing waſhed his bodie with ſalt water, and wrapped it vp in an old ſhirt of his, becauſe he had no other thing to lay it in: he ſought vpon the ſands, and found at the length a peece of an old fiſhers bote, enough to ſerue to burne his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was buſie gathering the broken peeces of this bote together, thither came vnto him an old ROMAINE, who in his youth had ſerued vnder Pompey, and ſaid vnto him: O friend, what art thou that prepareſt the funerals of Pompey the great? Philip anſwered, that he was a bondman of his infranchiſed. Well, ſaid he, thou ſhalt not haue all this honor alone, I pray thee yet let me accompany thee in ſo deuout a deede, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt ſo long in a ſtrange country, where I haue abidden ſuch miſerie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good happe, with mine owne hands to touch Pompeys bodie, and to helpe to burie the only and moſt famous Captaine of the ROMAINES. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had paſſed, comming out of CYPRVS, ſailed by the ſhore ſide, and perceiued a fire made for funerals, and Philip ſtanding by it, whom he knew not at the firſt. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But ſtraight fetching a great ſigh, alas, ſaid he, perhappes it is Pompey the great. Then he landed a litle, and was ſtraight taken and ſlaine. This was the end of Pompey the great. Not long after, Cæſar alſo came into ÆGYPT that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was preſented vnto him: but he turned his head aſide and would not ſee it, and abhorred him that brought it as a deteſtable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he ſealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lyon holding a ſword: he burſt out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolomy himſelfe alſo, being ouerthrowen in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vaniſhed away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rethoritian eſcaped Cæſars hands, and wandred vp & downe ÆGYPT in great miſerie, deſpiſed of euery man. Afterwards, Marcus Brutus (who ſlew Cæſar) conquering ASIA, met with him by chance, and putting him to all the torments he could poſſibly deuiſe, at the length ſlew him. The aſhes of Pompeys bodie were afterwardes brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the citie of ALBA.

THE COMPARISON OF Pompey with Ageſilaus.

How Pompey and Ageſilaus came to their greatneſſe.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you, the liues of Ageſilaus and Pompey: let vs compare their maners and conditions together, which theſe. Firſt, Pompey came to his honor and greatneſſe, by his inge and ſo aduanced himſelfe: and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing ny noble exploits, helping him to rid thoſe tirãts out of Italy held it in bondage. But Ageſilaus vſurped the kingdom of Lacedæmon, againſt the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides baſtard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull ſonne: and temned beſides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of king. Furthermore, Pompey did honor Sylla while he liued, & when he was dead, gaue him die honorable buriall in deſpight of Lepidus: & maried his daughter vnto Fauſtus the ſon Sylla. Ageſilaus contrarily did diſhonor Lyſander vpon light occaſion: but Pompey had deſ leſſe for Sylla, than Sylla had done for him. Lyſander on the other ſide, had made Ageſilaus of Lacedæmon, and Lieutenant generall of all Greece. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey vnto the common weale, were done of neceſſitie to pleaſe Cæſar and Scipio, both of the fathers in law. Ageſilaus alſo, to ſatisfie his ſonnes loue, ſaued Sphodrias life that had deſ death, for the miſchiefe he had done the Athenians: and he willingly alſo tooke part Phœbidas, not ſecretly, but openly, becauſe he had broken the peace made with the The

The faultes of Ageſilaus and Pompey.

To cõclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the Romaines, either through ignorance, or ſurely is frends: the ſame did Ageſilaus vnto the Lacedæmonians, through anger & in reuiuing warre with the Boeotians, vpon a full peace concluded. If we ſhall recken fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed: Pompeys fortune vnto the was vnlooked for. But Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonians to am lame kingdom, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had bene proued a ten thouſand times, yet had not the race of the Eurytiontides failed, but they could haue an other lawfull king among them, that ſhould haue gone vpright: had not Lyſander, Ageſilaus, kept the true meaning of the oracle from the Lacedæmonians. On the other againe for matters of gouernment, there was neuer ſuch an excellent deuiſe found out, done by Ageſilaus: to helpe the feare and danger the Lacedæmonians were in, for that fled at the battell of Leuctres, when he counſelled them to let the lawe ſleepe for day. Neither can any man match Pompeys with the like: who, to ſhew his friends what he was of, did breake the lawes which himſelfe had made. For Ageſilaus being driuen ceſſitie to aboliſh the lawe, to ſaue the life of his citizens, found ſuch a deuiſe that the law not hurtfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it ſhould muſt needes commende this for a great vertue and ciuilitie in Ageſilaus, who ſo ſoone as he eiued the Scytala (or ſcrowle of parchement from the Ephori) returned into his country, d left the warre of ASIA. He did not as Pompey, who made himſelfe great to the benefite of e common wealth, and for the common wealthes ſake, did forſake ſuch honour and ſo great thoritie, as neuer Captaine before him, but Alexander the great, had the like in thoſe rtes. But now to other matter. Touching their battels and exploits in warres, the multi- Things done by Ageſilaus and Pompey in warres. le of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xeno- w himſelfe if he were aliue, could not compare Ageſilaus victories vnto his: although for e ſingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had libertie unted him, to write and ſpeake of Ageſilaus what he thought good. Me thinkes alſo, there s great difference betwixt Pompey and Ageſilaus, in their equitie and clemencie towardes ir enemies. For, whileſt Ageſilaus went about to conquer THEBES, and vtterly to race d deſtroy the citie of MESSINA, the one being an auncient citie of his country, and the o- Ageſilaus loſt the ſignorie of the Lacedæmonians.

er the capitall citie of BOEOTIA: he had almoſt loſt his owne citie of SPARTA, for at the ſt he loſt the commaundement and rule he had ouer the reſt of GREECE. The other con- rily gaue cities vnto pirates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and ma- r of life: and when it was in his choiſe to lead Tigranes king of ARMENIA, in triumphe at OME, he choſe rather to make him a confederat of the ROMAINES, ſaying, that he preferred rpetuall honour before one dayes glory. But ſince it is reaſon we ſhould giue the firſt place d honour of the diſcipline of warres, vnto a Captaine of the greateſt skill and experience in arres: the LACEDÆMONIAN then leaueth the ROMAINE far behind. For firſt of all Ageſi- w neuer forſooke his citie, though it was beſieged with three ſcore & ten thouſand men, and t there were very few within the ſame to defend it, the which alſo a litle before had bene erthrowen at the battell of LEVCTRES. And Pompey on the other ſide, hearing that Cæſar Pompeys fault to forſake Rome.
ith fiue thouſand footemen onely had taken a towne in ITALIE: fled from ROME in very ate. And therein he can not be excuſed of one of theſe two: either that he fled cowardly ſo few men, or elſe that he had a falſe imagination of more. For he conueyed his wife and ildren away, but he left all the reſt without defence, and fled: where indeede he ſhould ei- er haue ouercome, valiantly fighting for defence of his country, or elſe haue receiued the onditions of peace which the conquerours ſhould haue offered him. For, he was a citizen nd allied vnto him. For he that thought it an vntollerable thing to prolong the terme of his ouernement, or to graunt him a ſecond Conſulſhip: did now giue him oportunitie, ſuffe- ng him to take the city of ROME, to ſay vnto Metellus the Tribune, & the reſt, that they were A ſpeciall point of a skilfull Captaine.
ll his priſoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefeſt point of an excellent Captaine, to compell is enemies to fight when he findeth himſelfe the ſtronger, and alſo to keepe himſelfe from mpulſion of fight when he is the weaker: Ageſilaus excelling in that, did euer keepe him ſelfe inuincible. Cæſar alſo had great skill therein, to keepe himſelfe from daunger being the eaker, and againe could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter deſtru- ion by land, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made himſelfe Lord of e treaſure, victuals, and alſo of the ſea, which his enemies had in their handes, without ghting. That which they alledge in his excuſe, is that which moſt doth condemne him, ſpe- ially for ſo great and skilfull a Captaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young Generall of n armie may eaſily be brought from his wife and ſafe counſell, with rumour and tumult of a w fearefull men, that ſhould perſwade him it were a ſhame and diſhonour for him if he did therwiſe: yet were this no ſtraunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the reat, whoſe campe the ROMAINES called their country, and his tent the Senate, & called all e Prætors and Conſuls that gouerned at ROME, rebels and traitors to the common wealth f ROME: who could excuſe him (who was neuer ſeene commaunded by other then him elfe, but had bene alwayes chiefe Captaine and Generall in any warre he made, and euer had e vpper hand) but that he was drawen on by the ſcoffes of Faonius, and Domitius, to hazard attell, to endaunger the whole Empire and libertie of ROME, onely for feare they ſhould call im king Agamemnon? Who, if he had ſo much regarded preſent infamie, he ſhould haue ought from the beginning for defence of the citie of ROME, and not to haue taken example of Themiſtocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a ſhame as he did, to lye in THESSALIE a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharſalia for a Theater, or cloſe campe, of neceſsitie to fight which of them ſhould haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to ſummon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he muſt aunſwere to his name, and come and fight, or elſe to looſe the honour of the crowne vnto an other. But there were infinite other fields and townes (and as a man would ſay the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by ſea gaue him choiſe to conquer if he would rather haue followed the ſteppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Ageſilaus himſelfe: who did patiently abide no leſſe tumultes within the citie ſelfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to ſummon him to come out to fight, for all the reſt of his country. And in ÆGYPT alſo, he did abide many falſe accuſations againſt him, wherewith the king himſelfe did burthen him, praying him alwayes to haue a litle patience. In fine, hauing followed the beſt counſell which he had determined with himſelfe from the beginning, he ſaued the ÆGYPTIANS againſt their willes: and furthermore, he did not onely keepe the citie of SPARTA from ſo great a daunger, but did alſo ſet vp tokens of triumphe in the ſame againſt the THEBANS, whereby, he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the ſlaughter, and beſides that, gaue his citizens occaſion to obtaine victorie afterwards. Hereupon Ageſilaus was highly prayſed of them, whoſe liues he had ſaued againſt their wils. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themſelues, through whom he had offended: yet ſome ſay, that he was deceiued by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the moſt part of the money to himſelfe which he had brought out of ASIA, did haſten and perſwade Pompey to giue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true, a worthy Captaine ſhould not ſo lightly haue bene brought into errour, vpon a falſe account, to hazard himſelfe to looſe all. Thus may we ſee what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore for their iourneys into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with ſmall honour, for moneys ſake to ſerue the barous people, with intent afterwardes to make warre with the GRECIANS. Laſtly, in that which we accuſe the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompeys ſake: for the like matter do they againe accuſe Ageſilaus. For, the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he truſted: and Ageſilaus forſooke them which truſted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight againſt them.

HAuing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander, and of Iulius Cæsar, that ouercame Pompey: hauing to speake of many things, I will vse none other preface, but onely desire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare all things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in those their noblest acts & most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intent is not to write histories, but onely liues. For, the noblest deedes do not alwayes shew mens vertues & vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport makes mens naturall dispositions & manners appeare more plaine, then the famous battels wonne, wherein are slaine ten thousand men, or the great armies, or cities won by siege or assault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other partes of the body, do take the resemblances of the face and fauour of the countenance, in the which consisteth the iudgement of their manners and disposition: euen so they must giue vs leaue to seeke out the signes and tokens of the minde onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to write the warres, battels, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was descended from Hercules by Caranus, and that of his mothers side, he came of the bloud of the AEacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time also was a young maiden, and an orphan without father or mother, in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the misterie and fraternity of the house of the religious: and that afterwardes, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whose consent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about into diuers flames. King Philip her husband also, shortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did seale his wiues belly, and that the seale where with he sealed, left behind the printe of a Lyon. Certaine wisards and soothsayers, told Philip that this dreame gaue him warning to looke straightly to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceiued with child, for that they do not seale a vessell that hath nothing in it: and that she was with child with a boy, which should haue a

Lions hart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay a sleepe in her bed, there was seene a serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefest cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips loue and kindnesse from her, & caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared some charme or enchantment, or else for that he thought himselfe vnmeete for her company, supposing her to be beloued of some god. Some do also report this after an other sort: as in this maner. That the women in those parts of long time, haue bene commonly possest with the spirite of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Clodones, and Mimallones (as much as warlike, and fierce) and do many things like vnto the wome of EDONIA, & THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Threskeuin (signifying in the Greeke toung, too superstitiously giuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other wome, louing to be inspired with such diuine madnes & fury: did celebrate their solemne sacrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous manner. For in these dances to Bacchus, she carried a great number of tame snakes about her, the which gliding vpon the Iuie wherewith the women were dressed in those ceremonies, & winding themselues about the litle iauelings they had in their hands, & the garlands about their heads: thereby they made men the more afrayed of them. Whereupon Philip after this dreame, sent Chæro MEGALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquire what it signified. Answere was giuen him, that he should do sacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammon, & honor him aboue all gods: & that he had lost one of his eyes with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber doore, saw the god in forme of a snake lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratosthenes writeth) bidding her son farewell when he went to conquer ASIA, after she had secretly told him alone, by whom he was begotten: she prayed him to be valiant, & to shew himselfe worthy his sonne, that begat him. Others tell also, that she was angry with this report, saying: will Alexander neuer leaue to make me suspected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the sixt day of the month of Hecatombeon (in English, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very same day, the temple of Diana in the city of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegesias MAGNESIAN doth witnes, whose eyther exclamation was so terrible and cold, that it was enough to haue quenched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana suffred her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, busie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the Priests, Magitians & Soothsayers, which were at that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognosticate some maruellous great misfortune to come, like men bestraught of their wits, they ran vp & down the city, smiting of their faces, & crying that some great plague & mischief was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had won the city of POTIDÆA, three messengers came to him the same day that brought him great newes. The first, that Parmenio had wonne a notable battell of the ILLYRIANS: the second, that his horse onely wan the bell & price at the Olympian games: & the third, that his wife had brought him a sonne called Alexãder. Philip being maruellous glad to heare these newes, the soothsayers did make his ioy yet greater: assuring him that his sonne which was borne with three victories all together, should be inuincible. Now for his stature and personage, the statues and images made of him by Lysippus do best declare it, for that he would be drawen of no man but him only. Diuers of his successors & friends did afterwards counterfeit his image, but that excellent workeman Lysippus onely, of all other the chiefest, hath perfectly drawen and resembled Alexanders manner of holding his necke, somwhat hanging downwards the left side, & also the sweet looke & cast of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not shew his fresh colour, but made him somewhat blacke & swarter, then his face indeed was: for naturally he had a very fayre white colour mingled also with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his brest. I remember I red also in the commẽtaries of Aristoxenus, that his skin had a maruellous good sauour, & that his breath was very sweet, in somuch that his body had so sweet a smell of it selfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a passing delightfull sauour, as if it had bene perfumed. And the cause hereof peraduenture might be, the very temperature and constitution of his body, which was hot and burning like fire. For Theophrastus is of opinion, that the sweet sauour commeth by meanes of the heate that dryeth vp the moysture of the body. By which reason also also it appeareth, that the dry & hot countryes parched with heate of the sunne, are those that deliuer vnto vs the best spices: because that the sunne drieth vp the moysture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, & to be hasty. Euen from his childhood they saw that he was giuen to be chast. For though otherwise he was very hot & hasty, yet was he hardly moued with lust or pleasure of the body, & would moderately vse it. But on the other side, the ambitiō & desire he had of honor, shewed a certaine greatnes of minde & noble courage, passing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) desirous of all kinde of glory: who like a Rethoritian had a delight to vtter his eloquence, & staped in his coynes, the victories he had won at the Olympian games, by the swift running of his horse & coches. For when he was asked one day (because he was swift of foote) whether he would assay to run for victory at the Olympian games: I could be content, said he, so I might run with kings. And yet to speake generally, he misliked all such contentiō for games. For it seemeth that he vtterly misliked all wrestling & other exercise for prise, where men did vse all their strēgth: but otherwise he himself made certain festiuall dayes & games of prise, for common stage players, musitians, & singers, & for the very Poets also. He delighted also in hunting of diuers kinds of beasts, and playing at the staffe. Ambassadours being sent on a time from the king of PERSIA, whilest his father was in some iourney out of his realme: Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, so wan them with his curteous entertainment, (for that he vsed no childish questions vnto them, nor asked them trifling matters, but what distance it was frō one place to an other, & which way they went into the high coūtrys of ASIA, & of the king of PERSIA himself, how he was towards his enemies, & what power he had) that he did rauish them with delight to heare him, in somuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence & sharpe wit, in respect of his sonnes courage, & noble minde, to attempt great enterprises. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken some Alexander couetted honour. The noble minde of Alexander. boosetie, or had won some great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would say to his playfellowes: sirs, my father will haue all, I shall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that shalbe ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but onely in valiantnes & honour, thought, that the greater conquestes & realmes his father should leaue him, the lesse he should haue to do for himselfe. And therfore, seeing that his fathers dominions & Empire increased dayly more and more, perceiuing all occasion taken from him to do any great enterprise: he desired no riches nor pleasure, but warres & battels, & aspired to a signory where he might win honour. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him vp as schoolemasters, gouernours, & groomes of his chamber to attend vpon him: & among those, Leonidas was the chiefest man that had the gouernement & charge of him, a man of a seuere disposition, & a kinseman also vnto the Queene Olympias. He misliked to be called a maister or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wherupō the others called him Alexanders gouernour, because he was a noble mā, & allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his schoolemaster, was Lysimachus, an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other maner of ciuility in him, sauing that he called himself Phœnix, Alexander Achilles, & Philip Peleus: & therfore he was well thought of, and was the second person next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephall the horse to sell vnto king Philip, as king thirteen talents, they went into the field to ryde him. The horse was found so rough & churlish that the ryders said he would neuer do seruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemens voyces about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon, Philip being afrayed, commaunded them to cary him away as a wild beast, & altogether vnprofitable: but which they had done, had not Alexander that stood by sayd, O gods, what a horse do they cary away, for lacke of skill & hart to hādle him. Philip heard what he said, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his words, seeming to be sory that they should send backe the horse alone: why, said Philip, doest thou controll them that haue more experience than thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horse? Alexander answered, & yet me thinkes I should handle him better thē all they haue done. But if thou canst not, no more thē they, replied Philip: what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly? I am content (quoth Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horse. Euery mā laughed to heare his answere: & the wager was layed betweene thē. Then ran Leonidas the gouernour of Alexander. Bucephall Alexāder horse.

Alexander to the horſe, and tooke him by the bridle: and turned him towardes the ſunne. It ſeemed that he had marked (as I ſuppoſe) how mad the horſe was to ſee his owne ſhadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he ſturred to & fro. Then Alexander ſpeaking gently to the horſe, and clapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his furie & ſnorting: ſoftly let fall his cloke from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any daunger, & holding the reines of the bridle hard, without ſtriking or ſturring the horſe, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he ſaw that the furie of the horſe was paſt, and that he began to gallop, he put him to his full career, and layed on ſpurres and voyce a good. Philip at the firſt with feare beholding his ſonnes agilitie, leaſt he ſhould take ſome hurt, ſayd neuer a word: but when he ſaw him readily turne the horſe at the end of his career, in a brauery for that he had done, all the lookers on gaue a ſhout for ioy. The father on the other ſide (as they ſay) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horſe, he ſayd vnto him kiſſing his head: O ſonne, thou muſt needes haue a realme that is meete for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, conſidering that of nature he was not to be won by extremitie, & that by gentle meanes and perſwaſion he could make him do what he would: he euer ſought rather to perſwade thē cōmaund him in any thing he had to do. Now Philip putting no great affiance in his ſchoolemaiſters of muſicke & humanitie, for the inſtruction & education of his ſonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed mē of greater learning then their capacities would reach vnto: and that as Sophocles ſayth,

He ſent for Ariſtotle (the greateſt Philoſopher in his time, & beſt learned) to teach his ſonne, vnto whō he gaue honorable ſtipend. For Philip hauing won & takē before, the city of STAGYRA, where Ariſtotle was borne: for his ſake he built it again, & repleniſhed it with inhabitāts which fled away, or otherwiſe were in bondage. He appointed them for a ſchoole houſe and dwelling place, the pleaſant houſe that is by the city of MIEZA. In that place are yet ſeene ſeats of ſtone which Ariſtotle cauſed to be made, and cloſe walkes to walke in the ſhadow. It is thought alſo, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariſtotle, morall Philoſophy & humanity, but alſo he heard of him other more ſecret, hard, and graue doctrine, which Ariſtotles ſchollers do properly call Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things ſpeculatiue, which requireth the maiſters teaching to vnderſtand thē, or elſe are kept from cōmon knowledge: which ſciences, they did not cōmonly teach. Alexander being paſſed into ASIA, & hearing that Ariſtotle had put out certaine bookes of that matter: for the honors ſake of Philoſophy, he wrote a letter vnto him, ſomwhat too plaine, & of this effect. Alexander, vnto Ariſtotle greeting. Thou haſt not done well to put forth the Acroamaticall ſciences. For wherein ſhall we excell other, if thoſe things which thou haſt ſecretly taught vs, be made cōmon to all? I do thee to vnderſtand, that I had rather excell others in excellency of knowledge, then in greatneſſe of power. Farewell. Whereunto Ariſtotle to pacifie this his ambitious humour, wrote vnto him againe, that theſe bookes were publiſhed, and not publiſhed. For to ſay truly, in all his treatiſes which be called μετὰ τὰ φυσικὰ: there is no plaine inſtructiō profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himſelf, nor yet to be taught by any other, then Ariſtotle himſelf, or his ſchollers. So that it is written as a memoriall for thē that haue bene entred & brought vp in the Peripateticke ſect & doctrine. It ſeemeth alſo, that it was Ariſtotle aboue all other, that made Alexāder take delight to ſtudy Phiſick. For Alexāder did not only like the knowledge of ſpeculatiō, but would exerciſe practiſe alſo, & helpe his friēds whē they were ſicke: & made beſides certain remedies, & rules to liue by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his own nature he was much ginē to his booke, and deſired to read much. He learned alſo the Iliades of Homer, of Ariſtotles correction, which they call ἡ ἐκ τοῦ νάρθηκος the corrected, as hauing paſſed vnder the rule: and layed it euery night vnder his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Oneſicrates writeth) the inſtitution of martiall diſcipline. And whē he was in the high coūtrys of ASIA, where he could not readily come by other books, he wrote vnto Harpalus to ſend thē to him. Harpalus ſent him the hiſtories of Philiſtus, with diuers tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, & AEſchylus: & certaine hymnes of Teleſtus and Philoxenus. Alexander did reuerence Ariſtotle at the firſt, as his father, and ſo he termed him: becauſe from his naturall father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to liue.

But

But afterwards he ſuſpected him ſomewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he ſo friendly to him as he had bene: whereby men perceiued that he did not beare him the good will he was wonte to do. This notwithſtanding, he left not that zeale and deſire he had to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he had learned from his youth, and ſtill continued with him. For he ſhewed diuers teſtimonies thereof. As, the honor he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philoſopher. The fiftie talents which he ſent vnto Xenocrates, Dandamis, and Calanus: of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but fiftene yeare olde, was left his Lieutenant in MACEDON, with the cuſtodie and charge of his great ſeale: at what time he alſo ſubdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled againſt him, and hauing wonne their citie by aſſault, he draue out the barbarous people, & made a Colonie of it of ſundrie nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to ſay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his father at the battell of CHÆRONEA againſt the GRECIANS, where it was reported, that it was he that gaue charge firſt of all vpon the holy bande of the THEBANS. Furthermore, there was an old oke ſeene in my time, which the countrimen commonly call Alexanders oke, becauſe his tent or pauillion was faſtned to it: and not farre from thence is the chappell houſe, where thoſe MACEDONIANS were buried that were ſlaine at the battell. For theſe cauſes, his father Philip loued him very dearely, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander king, & himſelfe their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fell out in his court afterwards, by reaſon of Philips new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and ſtrife amongſt the women: for the miſchiefe of diſſention and icalouſie of women, doth ſeparate the harts of kings one from another, whereof was chiefeſt cauſe, the ſharpeneſſe of Olympias, who being a icalous woman, fretting, and of a reuenging minde, did incenſe Alexander againſt his father. But the chiefeſt cauſe that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, falling in fancie with her when himſelf was paſt mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and hauing in his cups, he perſuaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feaſt, to pray to the goddes, that they might haue a lawfull heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to ſucceed him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith threw a cup at his head, and ſaid vnto him: why, traytor, what am I: doſt thou take me for a baſtard? Philip ſeeing that, roſe from the bourd, and drew out his ſword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choller and wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, loe, ſaid he, to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPE into ASIA, and ſtepping onely from one bed to an other, yee ſee him laide alongſt on the ground. After this great inſolencie, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, & carying her into his country of EPIRVS, he left her there, & himſelfe afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demaratus CORINTHIAN, a friend of king Philips, and very familiar with him, came to ſee him. Philip when he had courteouſly welcommed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agree together. Truely, O king, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is ſo full of quarrell & contention. Theſe words nipped Philip in ſuch ſort, & cauſed him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he ſent to perſuade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come backe againe. Now whē Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (deſiring for neceſſities ſake, to enter in league & friendſhip with Philip) offred his eldeſt daughter in mariage vnto Aridæus king Philips ſonne, & had ſent Ariſtocritus ambaſſador into MACEDON for that purpoſe: the friends of Alexander & his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports and ſuſpicions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduance Aridæus to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire in the kingdom. Alexander being netled therwith, ſent one Theſſalus a plaier of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus: to perſuade him to leaue Aridæus, that was a baſtard & a foole, & rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleaſed Pexodorus far better, to haue Alexander ſon in law, than Aridæus. Philip vnderſtanding this, went himſelfe into Alexanders chāber, taking Philotas with him (the ſon of Parmenio) one of his familiars, & bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a baſe minde, & was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, that would caſt himſelfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a ſlaue & ſubiect of a barbarous king. Therupon he wrote letters vnto CORINTH, that they should send Thessalus bound vnto him. And furthermore, he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius, & Ptolomy, his sonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe and placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, Pausanias susteining villany by the counsell and commandement of Attalus & Cleopatra, crauing iustice of Philip, and finding no amends: he conuerted all his anger against him, and for spight slue him himselfe. Of this murther, most men accused Queene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this young man, hauing iust cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspition of this murther. For some say, that Pausanias after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abused: who recited these verses to him of Euripides, in the tragedie of Medea, where she said in anger, that she would be reuenged:

Philip king of Macedon, slaine by Pausanias.

Both of the bridegroome and the bride,
And of the father in lawe.

Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent searche to be made, and all them to be seuerely punished that were of the conspiracie: and was angrie also that his mother Olympias had cruelly slaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuied and hated of dangerous enemies, and euery way full of danger. For, the barbarous nations that were neere neighbors vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of strangers, but desired to haue their naturall kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GREECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing a litle altered the gouernements, had through his insolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long bene acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders counsell of MACEDON, being affraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should vtterly forsake the affaires of GREECE, & not to follow them with extremitie, but that he should seeke to winne the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedy these new sturres. But he farre otherwise determined to stablish his safetie by courage and magnanimitie: persuading himselfe, that if they saw him stoope and yeelde at the beginning, how litle so euer it were, euery one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them sodainly with his armie, by the riuer of DANVBY, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that the THEBANS were reuolted, & that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make thē know that he was a man, he marched with his armie towards the streight of Thermopiles, saying that he would make Demosthenes the Orator see (who in his orations, whilst he was in ILLYRIA, & in the country of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was growne a stripling passing through THESALY, & should finde him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to giue them of the citie occasion to repent them, and therefore onely demanded Phœnix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and safetie vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The THEBANS on the other side, demanded of him Philotas, & Antipater, two of his chiefest seruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that al such as would defēd the liberty of GREECE should ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the MACEDONIANS at libertie to make warre with all crueltie. Then the THEBANS fought with greater courage and desire then they were able, considering that their enemies were many against one. And on the other side also when the garrison of the MACEDONIANS which were within the castell of CADMIA, made a salie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironned of all sides, were slaine in maner euery one of them, their citie taken, destroied, and rased euen to the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GREECE afraide by example of this great calamitie & miserie of the THEBANS, to the end none of them should dare from thenceforth once to rise against him. He would cloke this crueltie of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the PHOCIANS and PLATEIANS: who complaining to him of the iniuries the THEBANS had offred, could not deny them iustice. all the friends and kinſmen of the poet Pindarus, and all thoſe that had diſſuaded them which were the rebels: he ſold all the reſt of the citie of THEBES for ſlaues, which amounted to the number of thirtie thouſand perſons, beſides them that were ſlaine at the battell, which were ſix thouſand moe. Now amongſt the other miſeries and calamities of the poore citie of THEBES, there were certaine THRACIAN ſouldiers, who hauing ſpoiled and defaced the houſe of Timoclea, a vertuous ladie and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their captaine hauing rauiſhed her by force, asked her, whether ſhe had any where hidden any golde or ſiluer. The ladie told him, ſhe had. Then leading him into her garden, ſhe brought him vnto a well: where ſhe ſaid ſhe had caſt all her iewels & precious things, when ſhe heard the citie was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN ſtouped to looke into the well: ſhe ſtanding behind him, thruſt him in, and then threw ſtones enough on him, and ſo killed him. The ſouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and ſo caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander ſaw her countenance, and marked her gate: he ſuppoſed her at the firſt to be ſome great lady, ſhe followed the ſoldiers with ſuch a maieſtie and boldneſſe. Alexander then asking her what ſhe was: She aunſwered, that ſhe was the ſiſter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHÆRONEA, where being generall he was ſlaine, valiantly fighting for the defenſe of the libertie of GREECE. Alexander wondering at her noble aunſwer and courageous deed, commanded no man ſhould touche her nor her children, and ſo freely let her go whither ſhe would. He made league alſo with the ATHENIANS, though they were very ſory for their miſerable fortune. For the day of the ſolemne feaſt of their miſteries being come, they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteouſly entertaining all thoſe, that flying from THEBES came to them for ſuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was paſt him, following therein the nature of lyons: or becauſe that after ſo great an example of crueltie, he would ſhew a ſingular clemencie again: he did not only pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did alſo counſell them to looke wiſely to their doings, for their citie one daie ſhould command all GREECE, if he chaunſed to die. Men report, that certainly he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt ſo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cauſe that he afterwards ſhewed himſelfe more mercifull vnto diuerſe others. Afterwards alſo he did blame the furie of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being druncke, and the MACEDONIANS alſo to refuſe him to go any further to conquer the INDIANS, which was an imperfection of his enterpriſe, and a miniſhing alſo of his honour. Beſides, there was neuer THEBAN afterwards, that had eſcaped the furie of his victorie, and did make any petition to him, but he had his ſute. Thus was the ſtate of THEBES as you haue heard. Then the GRECIANS hauing aſſembled a generall councell of all the ſtates of GREECE within the ſtraights of Peloponneſus: there it was determined that they would make warre with the PERSIANS. Whereupon they choſe Alexander generall for all GREECE. Then diuers men comming to viſite Alexander, aſwell philoſophers, as gouernours of ſtates, to congratulate with him for his election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopia (who dwelt at CORINTH) would likewiſe come as the reſt had done: but when he ſaw he made no reckoning of him, & that he kept ſtill in the ſuburbes of CORINTHE, at a place called CRANIVM, he went himſelfe vnto him, and found him laide all a long in the ſunne. When Diogenes ſaw ſo many comming towards him, he ſate vp a litle, and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteouſly ſpake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea ſaid he, that I do: that thou ſtand out of my ſunne a litle. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this aunſwere, and maruelled ſo much at the great boldneſſe of this man, to ſee how ſmall account he made of him: that when he wēt his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, & mocking him, he told them: maiſters ſay what you liſt, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being deſirous to heare what the oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN would ſay vnto him touching the ſucceſſe of his iorney into ASIA: he went vnto the citie of DELPHES. It chanſed ſo, that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man vſed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithſtanding, he ſent firſt vnto the Nunne which pronounced the oracles to pray her to come to him But ſhe refuſed to come, alledging the cuſtome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander went thither himſelfe in perſon, and brought her out by force into the temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will: tolde him, My sonne, for that I see thou art inuincible. Alexander hearing that, said he desired no other oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to go on with his voyage, he had diuers signes and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cyprus, in the city of LEBETHRES, in those daies did sweate maruellously. Many men fearing that signe, Aristander the soothsaier bad Alexander be of good cheere, and hope well, for he should obtaine noble victories that should neuer be forgotten, the which should make the Poets and musicians sweate to write and sing them. Then, for his armie which he led with him, they that do set downe the least number, say that they were thirtie thousand footmen, and fiue thousand horsemen: and they that say more, do write, foure and thirtie thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen. Aristobulus writeth, that Alexander had no more but three score and tenne talents to pay his souldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouision of victuals, then for thirtie dayes onely. And Onesicritus saith moreouer, that he did owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithstanding that he began this warre with so small ability to maintaine it, he would neuer take shippe before he vnderstood the state of his friends, to know what abilitie they had to go with him, and before he had giuen vnto some, lands, and vnto other, a towne, and to others againe, the custome of some hauen. Thus by his bountie, hauing in maner spent almost the reuenues of the crowne of MACEDON, Perdiccas asked him: my Lord, what will you keep for your selfe? hope, said he. Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will also haue some part, since we go with you: and so refused the reuenue which the king had giuen him for his pension. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very franckly, and in such liberalitie spent all the reuenue he had. With this desire & determination, he went on to the straight of HELLESPONT, & going to the city of ILIVM he did sacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially vnto Achilles, whose graue he annointed with oyle, and ran naked round about it with his familiars, according to the auncient custome of funerals. Then he couered it with nosegays and flowers, saying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull friend, & after his death an excellent herauld to sing his praise. When he had done, and went vp and downe the citie to see all the monuments and notable things there: one asked him, if he would see Paris harpe. He aunswered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who plaied and sung vpon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of PERSIA, hauing leauied a great armie, sent his captaines and lieutenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessitie, being the only barre to stop his entrie into ASIA. Moreouer, the captaines of his councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the banck on the other side, which was verie high and steep, & could not be wonne without fighting. And some said also, that he should haue speciall care of the auncient regard of the moneth: because the kings of MACEDON did neuer vse to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is Iune. For that, said Alexander, we will remedy soone: let them call it the second moneth, Artemisium, which is Maye. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he should not medle the first day, because it was very late. Alexander made answer againe, that HELLESPONT would blush for shame, if he were now affraid to passe ouer the riuer, since he had already come ouer an arme of the sea. Thereupon he himselfe first entred the riuer with thirteene guidons of horsmen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies shot at him, as he was comming vp the other banck, which was very high and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which staied to receiue him in battell raye, thrusting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne so swifte, that it almost carried them downe the streame: insomuch that men thought him more rashe than wise, to lead his men with such danger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great a do recouered the other side, specially because the earth slidde away, by reason of the mud. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight pel mel on vpon an other, becauſe his enemies did ſet vpon the firſt that were paſſed ouer, before they could put themſelues into battell raie, with great cries, keeping their horſes very cloſe together, and fought firſt with their dartes, and afterwards came to the ſworde when their dartes were broken. Then many of them ſet vpon him alone, for he was eaſily to be knowne aboue the reſt by his ſhield & the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung frō the one ſide to the other, a maruelous faire white plume. Alexāder had a blow with a dart on his thigh but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roeſaces & Spithridates, both two chiefe captains of the PERSIANS, ſetting vpon Alexāder at once, he left the one, and riding ſtraight to Roeſaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him ſuch a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and ſtraight drew out his ſword. But ſo ſoone as they two had cloſed together, Spithridates coming at the one ſide of him, raiſed himſelfe vpon his ſtirrops and gaue Alexander with all his might ſuch a blow on his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creaſt off his helmet, & one of the ſides of his plume, and made ſuch a gaſhe, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to ſtrike Alexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thruſt him through with a partiſan, and at the very ſame inſtant, Roeſaces alſo fell dead from his horſe with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his ſworde. Now whileſt the horſemen fought with ſuch furie, the ſquadron of the battell of footemen of the MACEDONIANS had paſſed the riuer, and both the battels began to marche one againſt the other. The PERSIANS ſtucke not manfully to it any long time, but ſtraight turned their backs and fled, ſauing the GRECIANS which tooke paie of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander ſetting vpon them, more of will then diſcretion, had his horſe killed vnder him, being thruſt through the flanke with a ſword. This was not Bucephal, but an other horſe he had. All his men that were ſlaine or hurt at this battell, were hurte amongſt them valiantly fighting againſt deſperate men. It is reported that there were ſlaine at this firſt battell, twenty thouſand footmen of theſe barbarous people, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſemen. Of Alexanders ſide, Ariſtobulus writeth, that there were nine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footemen. Alexander to honor their valiantnes, cauſed euery one of their images to be made in braſſe by Lyſippus. And becauſe he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targettes, which he had wonne at the battell, and generally vpon all the other ſpoiles, he put this honorable inſcription. Alexander the ſonne of Philip, and the Grecians, excepting the Lacedæmonians, haue wonne this ſpoile vpon the barbarous Aſians. As for ſtore of gold or ſiluer, alſo purple ſilkes, or other ſuch precious ware which he gat among the PERSIANS: he ſent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This firſt victorie of Alexander, wrought ſuch a ſodaine change amongſt the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the citie ſelfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the leaſt through all the lowe countries and coaſts vpon the ſea, they yeelded ſtraight vnto him, ſauing the cities of HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did ſtill reſiſt him: howbeit at length he tooke them by force. When he had alſo conquered all thereabouts, he ſtood in doubt afterwards what he were beſt to determine. Somtime he had a maruellous deſire, whotly to follow Darius wherſoeuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. An other time againe, he thought it better firſt to occupy himſelfe in conquering of theſe low countries, & to make himſelf ſtrong with the money and riches he ſhould finde among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the countrie of LYDIA neere vnto the citie XANTHVM, they ſay there is a ſpring that brake of it ſelfe, and ouerflowing the banckes about it, caſt out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which ſaid: that the kingdome of the PERSIANS ſhould be deſtroied by the GRECIANS. This did further ſo encourage Alexander, that he made haſt to cleere all the ſea coaſt, euen as farre as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good ſucceſſe he had, running a long all the coaſt of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuerſe hiſtoriographers occaſion to ſet forth his doings with admiration, ſaying that it was one of the wonders of the worlde, that the furie of the ſea, which vnto all other was extreame roughe, and many times would ſwell ouer the toppes of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Me- nander himselfe in a comedie of his dooth witnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merily he saieth:

O great Alexander, how great is thy state?
For thou with thy selfe maist thus iustly debate.
If any man liuing I list for to call,
He commeth and humbly before me doth fall.
And if through the sourges my iorney doe lye, The waues giue me way, and the Sea becomes drie.

Yet Alexander himselfe simply writeth in his epistles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passed a place called the ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke shippe in the citie of PHASELIDES. There he remained many daies, & when he saw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN, standing in the market place: he went in a daunce thither one euening after supper, and cast flowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memorie of the dead, though it seemed but in sport, for that he was his companion when he liued, by meanes of Aristotle and his philosophie. After that he ouercame also the PISIDIANS, who thought to haue resisted him, and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the citie of GORDIVS, which is said to be the ancient seat of king Midas: he saw the charret that is so much spoken of, which is bound with the barcke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: that whosoeuer could vndoe the bande of that barke, was certainly ordeined to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing to vndoe that bande, and finding no ends to vndoe it by, they were so many folde wreathed one within the other: he drew out his sworde, and cut the knot in the middest. So that then many ends appeared. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret and so seuered them a sunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS & CAPPADOCIANS, and vnderstood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius generall of his army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination to leade his army into the high countries of ASIA. Then did king Darius himselfe come against Alexander, hauing leauied a great power at SVSA, of six hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wisards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he saw all the armie of the MACEDONIANS on a fire, and Alexander seruing of him in the selfe same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predecessor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he sodainely vanished from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS should haue noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all ASIA, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Asgandes vnto the king: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bolde also, when he sawe that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, supposing it had bene for that he was afraide of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sickenesse he had, the which some say he got, by extreame paines and trauell, and others also, because he washed himselfe in the riuer of Cydnus, which was colde as Ise. Howsoeuer it came, there was none of the other phisitians that durst vndertake to cure him, thinking his disease vncurable, and no medicines to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIANS would laie it to their charge, if Alexander miscaried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, considering his maister was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his loue and good will towards him, thought he should not doe that became him, if he did not proue (seeing him in extremitie and danger of life) the vtmost remedies of phisicke, what danger so euer he put himselfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to minister phisicke vnto Alexander, and persuaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a letter from the campe, aduertising him, that he should beware of Philip his phisitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches, that he would giue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his maister. Alexander when he had redde this letter, laide it vnder his beds head, head, and made none of his neareſt familiars acquainted therewith. When the hower came that he ſhould take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he ſhould drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, and withall, chearefully tooke the cup of him, ſhewing no maner of feare or miſtruſt of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the ſight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one inſtant, they looked one vpon an other, howbeit not both with like chearefull countenaunce. For Alexander looked merily vpon him, plainly ſhewing the truſt he had in his phiſitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phiſitian alſo beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be ſo falſely accuſed, and ſtraight lift vp his handes to heauen, calling the goddes to witneſſe that he was innocent, and then came to Alexanders bed ſide, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to doe as he would aduiſe him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the diſeaſe, and draue for the time, to the loweſt partes of his body, all his naturall ſtrength and powers: in ſomuch as his ſpeach failed him, and he fell into ſuch a weakenes, and almoſt ſooning, that his pulſe did ſcant beat, and his ſences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being paſt, Philip in few dayes recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten ſome ſtrength, he ſhewed him ſelfe openly vnto the MACEDONIANS: for they would not be pacified, nor perſwaded of his health vntill they had ſeene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a MACEDONIAN: & baniſhed out of his country, who knew Alexanders diſpoſition very wel. He finding that Darius ment to meete with Alexander within the ſtraightes and vallies of the mountains: beſought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him, conſidering that he had a great hoaſt of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was moſt for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius aunſwered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replied, for that, O king, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way comming towards you. Al theſe perſwaſions of Amyntas could not turn Darius from making his campe to march towardes CILICIA. At the ſelfe ſame time alſo, Alexander went towardes SYRIA to meete with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them miſſed of the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this happe, and making haſt to meete with his enemy within the ſtraightes. Darius alſo ſeeking to win Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the ſtraights: began then to finde the fault and error committed, for that he had ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraights, (holden in on the one ſide with the mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ran betweene both) and that he was driuen to diſperſe his army into diuers companies, in a ſtony and ill fauored country, ill for horſemen to trauell, being on the contrary ſide a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footemen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wiſhe it to fight for his aduantage: ſo could he tell excellently well how to ſet his men in battell ray to winne the victory. For albeit that Alexander had the leſſe number by many then his enemy, yet he had ſuch policy and caſt with him, that he foreſaw all, and would not be enuironned: For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further, then he did his left wing, and fighting him ſelfe in the left wing in the formoſt rankes, he made all the barbarous people flie that ſtood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a ſword. Chares writeth, that Darius ſelfe did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithſtanding Alexander ſelfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater ſayeth, that in deede he was hurt on the thigh with a ſword, howbeit he did put him in no daunger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurt him. Thus hauing wonne a famous victory, and ſlaine about a hundred and tenne thouſand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius becauſe he fled hauing ſtill foure or fiue furlongs vantage before him: howbeit it tooke his charriot of battell wherein he fought, and his bow alſo. Then he returned from the chaſe, and found the MACEDONIANS ſacking and ſpoiling all the reſt of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches (although they had left the moſt part of their cariage behinde them in the city of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battell) but yet reſerued for him ſelfe all king Darius tent, which was full of a great number of officers, of rich moueables, and of gold and siluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bathe and sayed: come on, lette vs goe and washe off the sweate of the battell in Darius owne bathe. Nay, replied one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath: for the goodes of the vanquished are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bathe, and saw the basons and yewers, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed passing sweetly, that it was like a paradise: then going out of his bathe, and comming into his tent, seeing it so stately and large, his bedde, the table, and supper, and all ready in such sumptuous sort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and saied: this was a king in deede, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to goe to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongest other Ladies taken prisoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried: who hauing seene his chariot and bow, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of them selues thinking Darius had bene slaine. Alexander paused a good while and gaue no aunswer, pitying more their misfortune, then reioysing at his owne good happe. Then he presently sent one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderstand, that Darius was a liue, and that they should not neede to be afraied of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they should haue at his handes all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his handes. As these wordes pleased the captiue Ladies, so the deedes that followed, made them finde his clemency to be no lesse. For first hee suffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they would, euen of them that had bene slain in the battell, and to take as much silkes of the spoiles, iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honor their funerals with: and also did lessen no part of their honor, nor of the number of their officers and seruaunts, nor of any iotte of their estate which they had before, but did allow them also greater pensions, then they had before. But aboue all, the princelyest grace, and most noble fauor that Alexander shewed vnto these captiue princesses, which had alwaies liued in honorable fame and chastity, was this: That they neuer heard word, or so much as any suspition that should make them afrayed to be dishonored or deflowred: but were priuately among them selues vnuisited or repayred vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in some close monasterie: although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I suppose to conquer him selfe, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touch them nor any other, maide or wife, before he maried them, Barsine onely excepted, who being left Memmons widow (generall of king Darius by sea) was taken by the city of DAMAS. Shee being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kings daughter) Alexander was bolde with her by Parmenioes procurement, (as Aristobulus writeth) who intised him to embrace the company of so excellent a woman, and passing faire besides. Furthermore, beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies besides which were prisoners, what goodly faire women they were: hee spake it pleasantly, that the Ladies of PERSIA made mens eyes sore to behold them. Notwithstanding, preferring the beauty of his continency, before their sweete faire faces: hee passed by without any sparke of affection towardes them, more then if they had bene images of stone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his lieutenaunt in the low countries vppon the sea coast, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchaunt of TARENTVM, had to sell two goodly young boies, maruellous faire: and therefore that he sent vnto him to know his pleasure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O, my friendes, what villany hath euer Philoxenus seene in me, that he should deuise (hauing nothing to doe there) to purchase me such infamy? whereuppon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull wordes, that he should send that vile TARENTINE marchant Theodorus and his marchandise to the Deuill. Hee sharpely punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beauty bare the onely

An other time also, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowred two of the souldiers wiues that were strangers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them guilty of the rape, that then hee should put them both to death, as bruite beastes borne to destroy mankinde. And in that letter he wrote thus of him selfe. For my selfe, said he, I haue neither seene, nor desired to see Darius wife: neither haue I suffered any speach of her beauty before me. Moreouer he saied, that he did vnderstand that he was mortall by these two things: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weakenesse of our nature proceedeth sleepe and sensuality. He was also no greedy gutte, but temperate in eating, as he shewed by many proofes: but chiefely in that he said vnto the princesse Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For when (for the loue shee bare him) shee daily sent him sundry delicate dishes of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and besides the meate it selfe, the pastlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he answered that he could not tell what to doe with them, for he had better cookes then those appointed him by his gouernour Leonidas, to witte: for his dinner, to rise before day, and to march by night: and for his supper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, sayed he, would oftentimes open the chestes where my bedding and apparell lay, to see if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceites among them. Furthermore, he was lesse giuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For hee was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, because he sate long at the bourd, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound some tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leysure. For hauing matters to doe, there was neither feast, bancket, play, mariage, nor any pastime that could stay him: as they had done other captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the shortnesse of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deedes he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leysure, after he was vp in the morning, first of all he would doe sacrifice to the goddes, and then would goe to dinner, passing away all the rest of the day, in hunting, writing some thing, taking vp some quarrell betweene souldiers, or else in studying. If he went any iourney of no hasty businesse, he would exercise him selfe by the way as he went, shooting in his bow, or learning to get vp or out of his charret sodainely as it ranne. Oftentimes also for his pastime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birdes, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances for euery day. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and noint him selfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his supper were ready. He would euer suppe late, and was very curious to see, that euery man at his bourde were a like serued, and would sit long at the table, because he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before. Otherwise he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite vppon, and as pleasant, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelinesse to adorne a prince, sauing that hee would be some thing ouer busie in glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging souldier: neither was he contented him selfe to please his own humor that way, but would also suffer his familiars to sooth him euen to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would neither praise him in his presence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durst say selfe of the praises which they gaue him. For of the first they were ashamed, and by the second they fell in daunger. After supper, he would washe him selfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For him selfe, he was nothing curious of dainty dishes: for when any did send him rare fruites, or fish, from the countries neare the sea side, he would send them abroad vnto his friendes, and seldome keepe any thing for him selfe. His table notwithstanding was alwayes very honourably serued, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his conquestes: till it came to the summe of tenne thousand drachmas a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceede that summe, and moreouer commaunded all men that would feast him, that they should not spend aboue that summe. After this battell of ISSVS, he sent vnto the city of DAMAS, to take all the gold and siluer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of armes of the THESSALIANS spedde them full well. For therefore did he ſend them thither, becauſe he ſaw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and ſo were the reſt of his army alſo well ſtored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing taſted firſt of the gold, ſiluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by ſent doe follow the tracke of beaſtes, euen ſo were they greedy to follow after the goodes of the PERSIANS. Firſt Alexander thought it beſt to winne all the ſea coaſt. Thither came the kings of CYPRVS, and PHOENICIA, and deliuered vp to him the whole Iland and al PHOENICIA, ſauing onely the city of TYRE. That city he beſieged ſeauen monethes together by land, with great bulwarkes and diuerſe engines of battery, and by ſea, with two hundred gallies. During this ſiege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the city, and called him by his name: and there were diuerſe TYRIANS alſo that dreamed in likewiſe, that Apollo told them that he would goe vnto Alexander, becauſe he was not pleaſed with their doings in the city. Thereupon they bound his image, (which was of a wonderfull bigneſſe) with great chaines, and nailed him downe faſt to the baſe, as if he had bene a traitour that would haue yeelded him ſelfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauoring Alexander. Alexander had there alſo another dreame. For he dreamed that he ſaw a Satyre a far off ſporting with him, and when he thought to haue comme neare to haue taken him, hee ſtill eſcaped from him: vntill at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his hands. The ſoothſayers being asked what this dreame ſhould ſignifie, aunſwered probably, by deuiding Satyre into two, and then it is Σὰ τύρος: which ſignifieth the city of TYRE ſhall be thine. And they doe yet ſhew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he ſaw the Satyre. Continuing this ſiege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell vpon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great daunger of being caſt away, onely becauſe he heard his tutor Lyſimachus that followed him, ſay boaſtingly, that he was not inferior, nor older then the Phœnix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horſes, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of ſo curteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lyſimachus behinde him (who was ſo weary that he could goe no further) but becauſe it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, hee came behinde to encorage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his army with very few men about him, and benighted beſides: moreouer, it was very cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiuing diuerſe fires which the enemies had made, ſome in one place, and ſome in an other, truſting to his valiantnes, hauing alwaies prouided remedy in extremity, when the MACEDONIANS were diſtreſſed, him ſelf euer putting to his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous people that lay by the fire ſide, he ſnatched away a fire brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were ſo affraied, that they ranne their way as faſt as they could. Other alſo thinking to come and ſet vppon him, hee ſlue them euery man, and ſo lay there that night, him ſelfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the ſiege of TYRE, that fell out thus. Alexander cauſed the moſt part of his army to take reſt, being ouerharried and wearied with ſo many battels as they had fought: and ſent a few of his men onely to giue aſſault vnto the city, to keepe the TYRIANS occupied, that they ſhould take no reſt. One day the Soothſayer Ariſtander ſacrificing vnto the goddes, hauing conſidered of the ſignes of the intralles of the beaſtes: did aſſure them that were preſent, that the city ſhoulde be taken by the later end of the moneth. Euery body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very laſt day of the moneth. Alexander ſeeing him amated, as one that could not tell what to ſay to it, ſeeking euer to bring thoſe tokens to effect, which the Soothſayers did prognoſticate: commanded them that they ſhould not reckon that day the thirty day, but the ſeauen and twenty, and immediatly vppon it made the trumpet ſound the allarme, and giue a hotter aſſault to the walle, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valiantly on both ſides, in ſo much as they that were left in the camp, could not keepe in, but muſt needs run to the aſſault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS ſeeing the aſſault ſo hot on euery ſide, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes was the citie taken the ſelfe ſame day.

Alexander a pleasant prince as any could be

Another time alſo, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe city of SYRIA, there fell a clodde of earth vppon his ſhoulder, out of the which there flew a bird into the aire. The birde lighting vppon one of the engines of his battry, was caught with the nettes made of ſinewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Ariſtander did prognoſticate, that it ſignified he ſhould bee hurt in his ſhoulder, notwithſtanding, that he ſhould yet take the towne. And in deede ſo it came to paſſe. When he ſent great preſentes of ſpoiles which hee wanne at the ſacke of this city, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuerſe others of his friends: among other things, he ſent vnto Leonidas his gouernour, fiue hundred talentes waight of frankenſence, and a hundred talents waight of myrre: remembring the hope he put him vnto when he was a childe. For, as Alexander was vppon a day ſacrificing vnto the goddes, he tooke both his handes full of frankenſence to caſt into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his gouernour Leonidas ſaw him, he ſaied thus vnto him: When thou haſt conquered the countrey where theſe ſweete things grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, ſpare that litle thou haſt at this preſent. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this ſort: we doe ſend thee plenty of frankenſence and myrre, becauſe thou ſhouldeſt no more be a niggard vnto the goddes. There was brought vnto him alſo a litle coffer alſo, which was thought to be the precioueſt thing and the richeſt, that was gotten of all the ſpoiles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he ſaw it, hee asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fitteſt, and the beſt thing to be put into it. Some ſaid one thing, ſome ſaied an other thing: but he ſaied, he would put the Iliades of Homer into it, as the worthieſt thing. This is confirmed by the beſt hiſtoriographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides wordes, be true: then it appeareth that he did profite him ſelfe much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered EGYPT, hee determined to builde a great city, and to repleniſh it with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as hee was about to incloſe a certaine ground, which hee had choſen by the aduiſe of his engineers, and workemaiſters: the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he ſaw an old man ſtanding before him, full of white haires, with an honourable preſence, and comming towardes him ſaied theſe verſes.

Alexanders dreame in Egypt.

Within the foming ſea there lies a certaine Iland, right Againſt the ſhore of Egypt, which of auncient Pharos hight.

As ſoone as he roſe the next morning, he went to ſee this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nylus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meeteſt place that could be, to build the city which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broad enough, that ſeparateth a great lake on the one ſide, and the ſea on the other, the which doeth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he ſaied that Homer was wonderfull in all his things, but that amongeſt others, he was an excellent Architecture: and commaunded, that ſtraight they ſhould caſt the platforme of the city, according to the ſituation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driuen to take meale, and with that did marke out vpon the earth being black, the compaſſe of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall partes, either of them reſembled the skirts and faſhion of the MACEDONIAN cloke. Alexander liked this draught paſſingly well. But there roſe vpon the ſodaine out of the riuer or lake, ſuch an infinite multitude of great fowle of all ſortes, that they couered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuite, did eate vp all the meale, and left not a crum. Alexander liked not theſe ſignes. Notwithſtanding, his Soothſayers bad him not be diſcouraged, for they told him it was a ſigne that hee ſhould build a city there, ſo plentifull of all things, that he ſhould maintaine all ſortes of people. Then he commaunded them, vnto whom hee had giuen the charge of the building, that they ſhould goe forward with their worke, and he him ſelfe in the meane time, tooke his iourney to goe viſite the temple of Iupiter Hammon. The iourney was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two dangers aboue all the reſt moſt ſpeciall. The firſt, lacke of water, becauſe they had to trauell many dayes iourney through a great deſert. The ſecond was, the daunger of the riſing of the ſouth winde by the way, to blow the ſand abroad, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there roſe ſuch a tempeſt in that deſert, that blew vp whole hilles of ſand, which ſlue fifty thouſand men of Cambyſes army. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know theſe daungers very well: howbeit it was hard to diſſwade Alexander from any thing which he had a deſire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attemptes, made him conſtant and reſolute in his determinations: and his noble corage beſides, made him inuincible in all things he tooke in hand, in ſomuch as he did not only compell his enemies, but he had power alſo of time and place. In that voyage, in ſtead of theſe former daungers ſpoken of, he had many helps, the which are ſuppoſed were ſent him from the goddes, by the oracles that followed afterwardes. For in a certaine ſort, they haue beleeued the oracles that were written of him. Firſt of all, the wonderfull water and great ſhowers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the firſt danger, and did quench their thirſt, and moyſted the drineſſe of the ſand in ſuch ſort, that there came a ſweete freſh aire from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to ſhew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downe, they could not tell where: there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying faſt when they ſaw them follow them, and ſtayed for them when they were behinde. But Calliſthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noiſe of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right way which had loſt their way. Thus Alexander in the end, hauing paſſed through this wilderneſſe, he came vnto the temple he ſought for: where, the prophet or chiefe prieſt ſaluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The prieſt aunſwered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaſpheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearſing that he had ſpoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conſpired the death of Philip his father were all puniſhed. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to be king ouer all the world. The god aunſwered him by the mouth of his prophet, he ſhould: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great preſents vnto the god, and gaue money large to the prieſts, and miniſters of the temple. This is that the moſt part of writers doe declare, touching Alexanders demand, and the oracles giuen him. Yet did Alexander him ſelfe write vnto his mother, that he had ſecret oracles from the god, which hee would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into MACEDON. Others ſay alſo, that the prophet meaning to ſalute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would haue ſaid vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deare ſonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, becauſe the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the later end, ſaying, O Pai dios, to wit, O ſonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that miſtaking. Whereupon there ran a rumor ſtraight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his ſonne. It is ſaied alſo, that he heard Pſammon the philoſopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when he ſaied that god was king of all mortall men. For (ſay he) he that commandeth all things, muſt needes be god. But Alexander ſelfe ſpake better, and like a philoſopher, when he ſaid: That god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the beſt ſort for him ſelfe. To conclude, he ſhewed him ſelfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainely beleeued that he had bene begotten of ſome god: but vnto the GRECIANS he ſpake more modeſtly of diuine generation. For in a letter hee wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the city of SAMOS, he ſaid: I gaue ye not that noble free city but it was giuen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord and father: meaning Philip. Afterwardes alſo being ſtriken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My frends ſaid he, This bloud which is ſpilt, is mans bloud, and not as Homer ſaied,

And one day alſo in a maruellous great thunder, when euery man was afraied, Anaxarchus the Rethoritian being preſent, ſaid vnto him: O thou ſonne of Iupiter, wilt thou doe as much? no ſaid he, laughing on him, I will not be ſo fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldeſt haue me diſdaining the ſeruice of fiſh to my bord, becauſe thou ſeeſt not princes heades ſerued in.

The ſaying of Pſammon the philoſopher of the prouidence of God.

Alexander aſcribeth godhead to himſelfe.

And the report goeth also, that Alexander vpon a time sending a litle fish vnto Hephæstion, Anaxarchus should saye as it were in mockery, that they which aboue others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the worlde, or else as litle as others haue. By these proofes and reasons alleadged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of himselfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keepe other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into EGYPT, he made many sacrifices, feastes, and processions in honor of the goddes, sundry dances, Tragedies and such like passetimes goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which striued euery one to exceede the other. For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the setters of thē forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lotte a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defraie the charges of these past ſmes. These kings were very earnest who should doe best, but specially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINA, in CYPRVS: and Pasicrates, Lord of the citie of SOLES. For it fell to their lot to furnish two of the excellentest players, Pasicrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus: whom Alexander loued singularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victor, by the iudges deputed to giue sentence. For when he went from the plaies, he told them he did like the iudges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would haue bene contented to haue giuen the one halfe of his realme, not to haue seene Thessalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the feastes of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaied, and a fine set on his head for his absence: he besought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalf, that they would release his penalty. Alexander would not so doe, but sent thither his money whereof he was condemned, and paide it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent stage plaier had pleased Alexander well, and did foiste in a verse in his comedie, conteyning a petition of tenne talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certaine of his friends also, to pray him to take tenne thousand talentes for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his handes, and for all the countries, landes and signiories on this side the riuer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thenceforce he might be his kinsman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Amongst them Parmenio said vnto him: if I were Alexander, ꝙ he, surely I would accept this offer. So would I indeed, ꝙ Alexander againe, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit himselfe, he would vse him courteously: if not, that then he would presently march towardes him. But he repented him afterwardes, when king Darius wife was dead with childe: for without dissimulation it greeued him much, that he had lost so noble an occasion to shew his courtesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her body honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongest the Eunuches of the queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexanders campe, taking his horse backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him news of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: Oh gods? what wretched hap haue the PERSIANS? that haue not onely had the wife and sister of their king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that shee is dead also in trauell of child, shee hath bene depriued of princely buriall? Then spake the Eunuch to him, and saied: For her buriall, most gracious king, & for all due honor that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilst shee liued prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iotte of their honour they were wont to haue before, sauing onely to see the light of your honour, the which, god Oromasdes graunt to restore againe (if it be his will) vnto your maiesty: neither was there any honour wanting at her death (to set forth her stately funeralles) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in victory, as he is valiaunt in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in minde for very griefe: tooke the Eunuche aside into the secretest place of his tent, and saied vnto him. If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, become a MACEDONIAN, but doest in thy hart acknowledge Darius, for thy ſoueraine Lord and maiſter: I pray thee, and do alſo coniure thee, by the reuerence thou beareſt vnto this bright light of the ſunne, and to the right hand of the king, that thou doe tell me truely. Are theſe the leaſt euilles which I lament in Statira, her impriſonment and death? And did ſhe not in her life make vs more miſerable by her diſhonor, then if we had diſhonorably fallen into the hands of a cruell enemie? For, what honeſt communication I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a priſoner: hauing done her ſo much honor as he hath done? Darius going on with theſe ſpeeches, Tireus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, and beſought him not to ſay ſo, neither to bleamiſh the vertue of Alexander in that ſorte, nor yet ſo to diſhonor his ſiſter and wife deceaſed, and thereby alſo to depriue himſelfe of the greateſt comfort he could wiſh to haue in this calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemie that had greater vertues than a man could poſſibly haue: but rather that he ſhould wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had ſhewed himſelfe chaſter to the Ladies, than valiant againſt the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honeſtie, chaſtitie, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe othes. Then Darius comming out among his friendes againe, holding vp his hands vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods. O heauenly gods, creators of men, and protectors of kings and realmes: firſt, I beſech you grant me, that reſtoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good ſtate, I may leaue the realme vnto my ſucceſſors, with that glorie and fame I receiued it of my predeceſſors: that obtaining victory, I may vſe Alexander with that great honor and curteſie, which he hath in my miſery ſhewed vnto thoſe I loued beſt in the world. Or otherwiſe if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of PERSIA muſt needs haue end, either through diuine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: Then, good godds yet graunt, that none but Alexander after me, may ſit in Cyrus throne. Diuers writers do agree, that theſe things came euen thus to paſſe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this ſide of the riuer of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thouſand fighting men. It was told him by ſome of his friendes to make him laugh, that the ſlaues of his armie had deuided themſelues in two partes, and had choſen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the firſt, they beganne to skirmiſh only with cloddes of earth, and afterwardes with fiſtes, but at the laſt, they grew ſo hot, that they came to plaine ſtones and ſtaues, ſo that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes haue the two Generals fight hande to hande one with the other: and Alexander ſelfe did arme him that was called Alexander, & Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the army thereupon was gathered together to ſee this combat betwene thē, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was ſharp betwene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: & Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to goe after the PERSIAN maner. Thus it is written by Eratoſthenes. The great battel that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many write report) at Arbeles, but at Gauſameles, which ſignifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the houſe of the cammell. For ſome one of the ancient kings of PERSIA that had eſcaped from the handes of his enemies, flying vpon a drumbledary cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipſe of the moone, in the moneth called Bœdromion (now Auguſt) about the time that the feaſt of the miſteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleuenth night after that, both their armies being in ſight of the other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went himſelfe by torch light viewing his bands and companies. Alexander on the other ſide whileſt his MACEDONIAN ſouldiers ſlept, was before his tent with Ariſtander the Soothſayer, and made certaine ſecret ceremonies and ſacrifices vnto Apollo. The auncient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, ſpecially Parmenio, ſeeing all the valley betwixt the riuer of Miphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noiſe as of a confuſed multitude of people that filled their campe with the ſound thereof: they were amazed, and conſulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpoſſible to fight a battell with ſuch an incredible multitude of people. Thereuppon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counſell him to giue battell by night, because because the darkenes thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the sight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable answer: I will not steale victorie quoth he. This answer seemed very fonde and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasant, being neere so great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present noble courage, and a deepe consideration of him, to thinke what shoulde happen: thereby to giue Darius no manner of occasion (if he were ouercome) to take hart againe, and to proue an other battell, accusing the darkenes of the night as cause of his ouerthrowe: as he had done at the first conflict, imputing his ouerthrowe to the mountaines, the straights, and the sea. For, sayed he, Darius will neuer leaue to make warres with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, hauing so large a realme as he hath, & such a world of people besides: but then he will no more hazard battell, when his hart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he seeth his army twoone daies ouerthrowen by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layed him downe to sleepe, and slept all that night more soundly than he was wont to doe before: insomuch as the Lordes and Princes of his campe comming to waite vpon him at his vprising, maruelled when they found him so sounde asleepe, and therefore of themselues they cõmaunded the souldiers to eate. Afterwardes, perceiuing that time came fast vpon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and comming to his bedde side, called him twise or thrise by name, till at the last he awaked him, and asked him how it chanced that he slept so long, like one that had alreadie ouercome, and that did not thinke he should fight as great and daungerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, said Alexander, laughing on him: doest thou not thinke we haue already ouercome, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a country vtterly destroyed, as we should otherwise haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue come to battell, and destroyed the country before vs? Now Alexander did not only shew himselfe before the battell, but euen at the very instant of battell, a noble man of courage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue such a fierce onset vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them giue backe: and Mazeus also, king Darius lieutenant, sent certaine troupes of horsemen out of their battell, to giue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to garde the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, sent immediatly to aduertise Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be lost, if he did not send presently to aide the rereward. When these newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already giuen the signall of battell vnto his men for to giue charge. Whereupon he answered the messenger that brought him these newes, that he should tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wanne the battell they should not onely saue their owne cariage, but also winne the cariage of their enemies: and if it were their chance to lose it, then that they should not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their slaues, but only to thinke to die honorably, valiantly fighting for his life. Hauing sent this message vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The rest of his armor for his body, he had put it on before in his tent, which was, a SICILIAN cassocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many foldes of canuas with oylet holes, which was gotten among the spoiles at the battell of ISSVS. His head peece was as bright as siluer, made by Theophilus the armorer: his collar lyke to the same, all set full of precious stones, and he had a sworde by his side marueilous light, and of excellent temper, which the king of the CITIEIANS had giuen him, vsing commonly to fight with his sword at any set battel. His coat armor was maruellous rich, and of sumptuous workemanshippe, far aboue all the rest he wore. It was of the workemanshippe of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a present, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did set his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ride alongest the bands to take view of them: he alwayes vsed to ride vpon an other horse to spare Bucephal, because he was then somewhat old: notwithstanding, when he ment in deede to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, and as soone as he was gotten vp on his backe, the trumpet sounded, & he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortations to encorage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS, and the other GRECIANS also, and when they had all promised him they would sticke to him like men, and prayed him to lead them, and giue charge vppon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hande, and holding vp his right hande vnto heauen: besought the goddes (as Callisthenes writeth) that if it were true, he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would please them that daye to helpe him, and to encorage the GRECIANS. The Soothsayer Aristander was then a horsebacke hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, & a crown of gold on his head, who shewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. This maruellously encoraged all the armie that saw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders side, encoraging one another, did set spurres to their horse to charge vppon the enemies. The battell of the footemen of the PERSIANS, beganne a litle to giue way, and before the foremost could come to giue them charge, the barbarous people turned their backes, and fled. The chase was great, Alexander driuing them that fled vppon the middest of their owne battell, where Darius selfe was in person. He espied him a farre off ouer the foremost rankes in the middest of his battell, being a goodly tall prince, standing in a chariot of warre, compassed in round with great troupes of horsemen, all sette in goodly ordinance to receiue the enemy. But when they saw Alexander at hand with so grimme a looke, chasing them that fled, through those that yet kept their rancks: there fell such a feare among them, that the most part dispersed themselues. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiantest men fought it out to the death before their king, and falling dead one vpon another, they did lette them that the enemies could not so well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Darius then seeing nothing but terror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bandes which he had set before him for safegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his charriot forward nor backward, the wheeles were so hindered and stayed with the heapes of dead bodies, and that the horse also being set vpon and hidde in manner in this conflict fell to leaping and plunging for feare, so that the charrettiers could no longer guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had fole, and so saued himselfe flying vpon her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: because there was yet a great squadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to haue delt but slackely and cowardly, either because his age had taken his courage from him, or else for that he enuied Alexanders greatnes & prosperitie, who against his will became ouergreat as Callisthenes said. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second message, and yet told not his men truely the cause why, but fayning that he would haue them leaue killing, and because also night came on: he caused the trumpet sound retreate, and so went towards his army, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place also, they had giuen the enemies the ouerthrowe, and that they fled euery way for life. The battell hauing this successe, euery man thought that the kingdome of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowen, and that Alexander likewise was becom only king of all ASIA: whereupon he made sumptuous sacrifices vnto the goddes, and gaue great riches, houses, landes and possessions vnto his friendes and familiars. Furthermore, to shew his liberality also vnto the GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies suppressed through out all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS should liue at liberty vnder their owne lawes. Particularly also he wrote vnto the PLATÆIANS, that hee would reedifie their city againe, because their predecessors in time past, had giuen their countrey vnto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the common liberty of all GREECE. He sent also into ITALY vnto the GROTONIANS, part of the spoile, to honor the memory of the valiantnes and good will of Phaullus their citizen, who in the time of the wars with the MEDES, (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALY had forsaken their naturall country men of GREECE it selfe, because they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a ship of his vnto SALAMINA, which hee armed and set forth at his owne charges, because he would beat the battell and partake also of the common daunger with the GRECIANS: such honor did Alexander bear vnto prowes, that he loued to reward and remember the worthy deeds of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the country of BABYLON, they al yeelded straight vnto him.

An Eagle flew ouer Alexanders head whē he went to fight with Darius.

The flying of Darius.

Alexanders third victory of Darius, and liberality to all men.

him. When he came into the country of the ECBATANIANS, he maruelled when he ſaw an opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall ſparkes of fire as out of a well: and that hard by alſo the earth ſpued out continually a kind of * maund or chalkie clay ſomewhat lyquid, of ſuch abundance, as it ſeemed like a lake. This maund or chalke is like vnto a kind of lyme or clay, but it is ſo eaſie to be ſet a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnes only of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is ſet a fire, and doth alſo ſet the aire a fire which is betwene both. The barbarous people of that country, being deſirous to ſhewe Alexander the nature of that Naptha, ſcattered the ſtreete that led to his lodging, with ſome of it. Then the day being ſhut in, they fired it at one of the endes, and the firſt droppes taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the reſt from one end of the ſtreete to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in bath at that time, and waited vpon by a page called Steuen: (a hard fauoured boy, but yet that had an excellent ſweete voice to ſing) one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwaies noynted and bathed the king, and much delighted him with his pleaſant conceits, aſked him if he would ſee the triall of this Naptha vpon Steuen: for if the fire tooke and went not out, then he would ſay it had a wonderfull force, and was vnquenchable. The page was contented to haue it proued vpon him. But ſo ſoone as they had laide it on him, and did but touch it onely, it tooke ſtraight of ſuch a flame, and ſo fired his bodie, that Alexander himſelfe was in a marueilous perplexitie withall. And ſure had it not bene by good hap, that there were many by ready with veſſels full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpoſſible to haue ſaued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet ſo he eſcaped narrowly, and beſides was ſicke long after. Now ſome apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, ſaying that therwith ſhe rubbed the crowne and lawne ſhe gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, ſo much ſpoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could caſt fire of themſelues, neither did the fire light by chaunce. But by oyling them with this Naptha ſhe wrought a certaine wayes to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride ſate. For the beames which the fire caſteth out, haue ouer ſome bodies no other force, but to heat and lighten them. But ſuch as haue an oyly drie humor, and thereby a ſimpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire: it eaſily enflameth and ſetteth a fire, by the forcible impreſſion of his beames. Howbeit they make a great queſtion of the cauſe of this inuerall force of Naptha, * or whether this liquid ſubſtance and moiſt humor that taketh fire ſo eaſily, doth come of the earth that is fatty and apt to conceiue fire. For this country of BABYLON is very hot, inſomuch as oftentimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp againe, as if the earth by vehement inflammation had a ſtrong blaſt to caſt it out: and men in the extreameſt heate of the ſummer, do ſleepe there, vppon great leather budgets filled full of freſh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his lieutenant & gouernor of that countrie, deſiring to ſet forth and beautifie the gardens of the kings pallace and walks of the ſame, with all manner of plants of GREECE: he brought all the reſt to good paſſe, ſauing Iuy only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer died, becauſe the heate and temper of the earth killed it: and the Iuy of it ſelfe liketh freſh aire and a could ground. This digreſſion is ſomwhat from the matter, but peraduenture the reader will not thinke it troubleſome, how hard ſoeuer he finde it, ſo it be not ouer tedious. Alexander hauing wonne the city of SVSA, he found within the caſtell foure thouſand talents in ready coine, gold and ſiluer, beſides other infinite treaſure and ineſtimable, amongeſt the which (it is ſayed) he found to the value of fiue thouſand talents weight of * purple HERMIONA ſilke which they had ſafe locked vp and kept the ſpace of two hundred yeares ſaue ten, and yet the colour kept as freſh as if it had bene newly made. Some ſay that the cauſe why it was ſo well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it, with honey, in ſilkes which before had bene died redde, and with white oile in white ſilkes. For, there are ſilkes ſeene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dino writeth furthermore, that the kings of PERSIA made water to bee brought from the riuers of Nylus and Iſter (otherwiſe called Danuby) which they did locke vp with their other treaſure for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, and to ſhew that they were Lordes of the world. The wayes to enter into PERSIA being very hard of paſſage, and in maner vnpaſſable, (both for the ilneſſe of the waies, as alſo for the gard that kept them, which were the choiſest men of PERSIA) Darius alſo being fled thither: there was one that ſpake the Greeke and PERSIAN toong (whoſe father was borne in the coũtry of LYCIA, & his mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by ſome compaſſe fetched about not very long, according to the Oracles anſwere of Alexander giuen by the mouth of Nunne Pythias, when hee was a child: that a LYCIAN ſhould guide and lead him againſt the PERSIANS. There was then great ſlaughter made in PERSIA of the priſoners that were taken. For Alexander himſelfe wrooth, that he commanded the men ſhould be put to the ſword, thinking that the beſt way to ſerue his turne. It is ſaid alſo, that there he found a maruellous treaſure of gold and ſiluer in readie money, as he had done before in the citie of SVSA: the which he caried away with all the reſt of the kings rich wardroppe, and with it laded tenne thouſand moyles, and fiue thouſande camels. Alexander, entring into the caſtle of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, ſawe by chance a great image of Xerxes lye on the ground, the which vnwares was throwen down by the multitude of the ſouldiers that came in, thronging one vpon an other. Thereupon he ſtayed, and ſpake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, ſaying: I can not tell whether I ſhould paſſe by thee, and let thee lye, for the warre thou madeſt ſometime againſt the GRECIANS: or whether I ſhould lift thee vp, reſpecting the noble mind & vertues thou haddeſt. In the end, when he had ſtood mute a long time, conſidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refreſh his weary army, becauſe it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure monethes together. The reporte goeth that the firſt time that Alexander ſate vnder the cloth of ſtate of king Darius, all of riche golde: Demarathus CORINTHIAN (who firſt beganne to loue him euen in his father Philips time) burſt out in teares for ioy, good olde man ſaying, that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were depriued of this bleſſed happe to ſee Alexander ſet in king Xerxes princely chayr. After that, preparing againe to goe againſt Darius, he would needes make mery one day, and refreſh himſelfe with ſome banquet. It chanced ſo, that he with his companions was bidden to a priuate feaſt priuately, where was aſſembled ſome fine curtiſans of his familiars, who with their friends taried at the banquet. Amongſt them was that famous Thais, borne in the coũtry of ATTICA, & then concubine to Ptolomy, king of EGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praiſing Alexander, and partly in ſporting wiſe, began to vtter matter in affection of her coũtrie, but yet of greater importance than became her mouth: ſaying, that that daye ſhe ſound her ſelfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines ſhe had taken, trauelling through all the countries of ASIA, following of his armie, now that ſhe had this fauor & good happe to be mery and pleaſant, in the proude and ſtately pallace of the great kings of PERSIA. But yet it would doe her more good, for a recreation to burne Xerxes houſe with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the citie of ATHENS: and herſelfe to giue the fire to it, before ſo noble a Prince as Alexander. Becauſe euer after it might be ſaid, that the women following his campe had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and iniuries they had done vnto GREECE: then all the Captaines of GREECE that euer were had done, either by land or ſea. When ſhe had ſayd, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands and made great noiſe for ioy, ſaying: that it were as good a deede as could be poſſible, and perſwaded Alexander vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perſwaſions, roſe vp, and putting a garland of flowers vpon his head, went formoſt him ſelfe: and all his familiars followed after him, crying and dauncing all about the caſtel. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it alſo, came thither immediatly with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good ſigne that Alexander ment to returne again into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the country of the barbarous people, ſith he did burne and deſtroy the kings caſtell. Thus, and in this ſort it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwiſe: that it was not burnt with ſuch ſport, but by determination of the councell. But howſoeuer it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did preſently repent him, and commaunded the fire to be quenched ſtraight. For his liberality, that good will and readineſſe to giue, increaſed with his conqueſtes: and when he did beſtow gifres of any, he would beſides his gift, euer giue them good countenance, on whom he beſtowed his grace and fauor. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariſto being Collonell of the PEONIANS, hauing ſlaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and ſayd: ſuch a preſent,

O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cup of gold. Yea quoth Alexander, smiling vpon him with an emptie cuppe. But I drinke to thee this cuppe full of good wine, and doe giue thee cup and all. An other time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the kings: and when the poore moyle was so wearie that she could no longer carie her burden, the moyletter put it vpon his owne backe, and loded himselfe withall, carying it so a good prety way: howbeit in the end being ouerloden, was about to throwe it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burthen he caried. When it was told him: well, q he to the moyletter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I giue it thee. To be short, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would ask him somwhat. He wrote also vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuse his giftes. It seemed that he had giuen nothing vnto a young boy called Serapion (who euer did serue them the ball that playd at tenis) because he asked him nothing. Wherfore, the king playing on a time, this young boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to himselfe. The king maruelling at it, at the length sayed vnto him: why, my boy, doest thou not giue me the ball? Because your maiestie doth not aske it me, q he. Alexander then vnderstanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, & did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him also one Proteas, a pleasant conceited man, and that could flent finely. It chanced vpon some occasion that Alexander fell out with him: whereuppon some of his friends were intercessors to the king for him, & besought him to pardon him: and Proteas himselfe also being present, craued pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgaue him. Then pleasantly replied Proteas, I desire it may please your grace, that I may receiue some testimonie to assure me I am in your fauor. Thereuppon the king straight commaunded one to geue him fiue talentes. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and gard about him, were very great, as it appeareth plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou spareſt not to geue thy frends large giftes, and that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them kings fellowes, they get many friends, and leaue the poste alone without any. His mother did many times write such like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very secret, sauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephestion being present drew nere, and read the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the seale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vse to seale his letters, and put it to Hephestions mouth. He gaue also vnto the sonne of Mazeus, (that was the chiefest man about Darius) a second gouernment, besides that which he had before, and greater than the first. This young noble man refused it, saying: why, and it please your grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio also, Bagoas house, where (as it is reported) he found a thousand talents worth, of the spoyles and goods of the SVSIANS. He wrote also vnto Antipater, that he should keepe a gard about his person, for he had many enemies that laye in wait for him. He did send also many goodly presents vnto his mother, but withall he wrote vnto her, that she would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her the office of a Captaine. She storming at it, he patiently did brooke her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long letter vnto him against his mother Olympias, when he had red it ouer: loe, said he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye will wipe out tenne thousande such letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his friendes became very dissolute & licentious in dyet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked shooes nailed with siluer nailes, that Leonatus also caused diuers cammelles to be loden amongst his cariage with powder of EGYPT, to put vpon him when he wrestled or vsed any other exercise of body & that also they caried after Philotus, toyles for chase and hunting, of a hundreth furlong long, and that there were also that vsed pretious perfumes & sweete sauors when they bathed themselues, more then there were that rubbed themselues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine chamberlaines to rubbe them in the bath, and to make their beddes soft and delicate: he wisely and courteously rebuked them and said. I maruell, sayd he, that you which haue fought in so often and great battelles, doe not remember that they which trauell, doe sleepe more sweete and soundly, than they that take their ease and doe nothing: and that you doe not marke, that comparing your life, with the manner of the life of the PERSIANS, to liue at pleasure is a vile thing, and to trauell is Princelie. And howe I pray you, can a man take paine to dresse his owne horse, or to make cleane his launce or helmet, that for slothfull curiosities sake, disdaineth to rubbe his owne bodie with his fine fingers? Are you ignorant that the type of honor in all our victorie consisteth, in scorning to doe that which we see them doe, whom we haue vanquished and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themselues with hardnes: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard himselfe more dangerously, then euer he had done before. Whereupon an Ambassador of LACEDÆMON being present to see him fight with a Lyon, and to kill him, sayed vnto him: truly your grace hath fought well with this Lyon, and tried which of you two should be king. Craterus after that, caused this hunting to be set vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES: where are the images of the Lyon, of the dogs, and of the king fighting with the Lyon, and of himselfe also that came to helpe him, all those images being of copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himself vnto all ieopardies, as well to exercise his strength & courage, as also to allure his men to doe the like. This notwithstanding his friends and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needes liue delicately and at ease, and would take no more paines, misliking vtterly to goe vp and downe the countries to make warre here and there, and thereupon beganne a litle to finde fault with Alexander, and to speake euill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly saying, that it was honor for a king to suffer himselfe to be slaundered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turnes he did vnto his friendes, did shewe his hartie loue and honor he bare them, as shall appeare vnto you by some examples that followe. Peucestas being bitten by a beare, did let his friendes vnderstand by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus. Send me worde at the least yet how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellowes did forsake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be punished. Hephæstion being absent about certaine businesse he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beast called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunately crossing Perdiccas darte, was stricken through both his thighes. Peucestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phisitian that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus also being sicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine sacrifices for the recouery of his health, and sent vnto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phisitian Pausanias ment to giue him a drinke of Elleborum, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he receiued that medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Cissus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus flying, because they did wrongfully accuse & slander him. When he had cõmanded there should be a bill made of all the olde mens names, and diseased persons that were in his camp, to send them home againe into their countrie: there was one Eurylochus ÆGINETA that made his name be billed among the sicke persons, & it was found afterwards that he was not sicke, and confessed that he did it onely to follow a young woman called Telesippa, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewards towards the sea side. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he answered him, that she was a curtisan free borne. Then sayed Aexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I cannot force her to tarrie: but seeke to winne her by giftes and fayer wordes to be contented to tarie, sithence she is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to see what paines he would take, to winne for his friendes, euen in such trifles as he did. As when he wrote into CILICIA for a seruant of Seleucus that was fled from his maister, sending straight commandement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by another letter he commendeth Peucestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a slaue of Craterus. And by one other letter also vnto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken sanctuarie in a temple, he commaunded him also to seeke to intise him out of the sanctuarie, to laye hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to meddle with him in any case. It is sayed also, that at the first when he vsed to sit in iugdement to heare criminall causes, whilest the accuser went on with his complaint and accusation: he alwayes vsed to laye his hand vppon one of his eares to keepe that cleane from the matter of accusation, accuſation, thereby reſeruing it to heare the purgation and iuſtification of the perſon condemned. But afterwardes, the number of accuſations that were brought before him, did ſo prouoke and alter him, that he did beleeue the falſe accuſations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he vnderſtoode they had ſpoken ill of him: and then he was ſo fierce, as no pardon would be graunted, for that he loued his honor, more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went againſt Darius, thinking that he ment to fight againe: but vnderſtanding that Beſſus had taken him, then he gaue the THESSALIANS leaue to departe home into their countrie, and gaue them two thouſand talentes, ouer and aboue their ordinarie paye. Alexander had then a marueilous long, hard, and painefull iorney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thouſand and three hundreth furlong, inſomuch as the moſt part of his men were euen wearie, and done, for lacke of water. It chaunced him one daye to meete with certen MACEDONIANS that caried (vppon moyles) goate skinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a riuer. They ſeeing Alexander in manner dead for thirſt, being about noone, ranne quickly to him, and in a head peece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They anſwered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet would haue your grace to liue: for though we loſe them, we may gette more children. When they had ſayd ſo, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thruſt out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had giuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it. For ſayd he, if I drinke alone, all theſe men heere will faint. Then they ſeeing the noble courage and curteſie of Alexander: cried out that he ſhould leade them: and therewithall beganne to ſpurre their horſes, ſaying, that they were not weary nor thirſt, nor did thinke themſelues mortall, ſo long as they had ſuch a king. Euery man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threeſcore onely that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, paſſing ouer much golde and ſiluer which was ſcattered abroade in the market place, and going alſo by many chariottes full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the ſpurre vntill they had ouertaken the foremoſt that fledde, thinking to haue founde Darius amongſt them. But at the length, with much a doe, they found him layed along in a coche, hauing many woundes vpon his bodie, ſome of darts and ſome of ſpeares. So he being almoſt at the laſt caſt, called for ſome drinke, and dranke colde water, which Polyſtratus gaue him. To whom when he had dronke, he ſayed: this is my laſt miſhappe my friend, that hauing receiued this pleaſure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the goddes Alexander, for the liberality and curteſy which he hath ſhewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my ſake. At theſe laſt wordes, he tooke Polyſtratus by the hande, and ſo gaue vp the goaſt. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely ſhewed that he was ſorie for his death and miſſortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he caſt it vpon the body of Darius. After that, hauing by good happe gotten Beſſus into his hands, he tare him in peces with two high ſtraight trees which he bowed downewards, and tyed his legs to each of them: ſo that when the trees were let goe, they gaue a ſodaine cruell ierke vp and caried either tree, a peece of his bodie with it. Then Alexander hauing giuen Darius corſe princely buriall, and embalmed him: he ſent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his friends. From thence he went into the country of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he ſawe the gulfe of the ſea Caſpium, which he thought of no leſſe greatneſſe, then the ſea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other ſeaes be. He could not then certainly find out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhoode he thought it was ſome breaking out of the lake or marriſh of Meotin. Yet ſome ancient naturall Philoſophers ſeemed to knowe truely what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conqueſt, they wrote, that of the foure chiefeſt gulfes of the ſea, that commeth from the Ocean, and doe enter within maine land, that which is more northerly, is the ſea Caſpium, which they call alſo Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the countrie, certen barbarous people ſodainely ſette vpon them that led Bucephal his horſe, and tooke him: but with that he was in ſuch a rage, that he sent a Herauld into their countrie to proclaime open warres vppon them, and that he would put man, woman and childe to the sword, if they brought him not his horse againe. Whereuppon, when his horse was returned home, and that they yeelded vp their cities and fortes into his hands: he did vse them all very courteously, and moreouer did giue them money for the ransome of his horse, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the countrie of PARTHIA. There hauing leasure enough, he beganne to apparell himselfe after the fashion of the barbarous people, because he thought thereby the better to winne the harts of the countriemen, framing himselfe vnto their owne fashions: or else to trye the harts of the MACEDONIANS, to see how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he meant to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their king, by litle and litle acquainting them to alow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithstanding, he would not at the first take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was very strange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without breeches, nor did weare a long gown trayling on the ground, nor a high coptanct hat, but tooke a meane apparell, betwixt the MEDES & the PERSIANS, more modest then theirs: and more costly then the last: and yet at the first he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or else priuately amongst his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed himselfe openly to the people in that apparell, whē he gaue them audience. This sight grieued the MACEDONIANS much: but they had his vertues in such admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take his owne pleasure, sithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow, and another time, had such a blow with a stone full in his necke, that it made him spurre-blinde a great while after, and yet neuertheless he neuer eschewed any bodily daunger. For he passed ouer the riuer of Oraxartes, which he tooke to be Tanais, and hauing in battell ouerthrowen the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase aboue a hundreth furlong, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosenesse of body. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the queene of the AMAZONES, as many writers doe testifie: among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Onesicritus, Antigenes and Hiero. But Chares, Ptolomy, Anticlides, & Philō THEBAN, Philip the historiographer, Hecateus ERETRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these doe write that it was not true: and it seemeth also that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the king of SCYTHIA offred him his daughter in mariage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is also sayed, that Onesicritus long time after that did reade vnto king Lysimachus, the fourth booke of his historie, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus smiling, sayd vnto him: why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit or not credit it, Alexanders estimation thereby is neither impaired nor aduanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being wearie with this long warre, would goe no further: he left all the rest of his armie behinde, and tooke onely twentie thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen of the choicest men of his armie, and with them inuaded the countrie of HYRCANIA. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had but seene them as it were in a dreame, and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely sturred them, and not altogether subdued ASIA: the people offended with them, would set vpon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheless, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protesting therewith against them that would goe, how they did forsake him, his frends, and those who had so good harts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a iorney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MACEDONIANS. This selfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cryed out, and bad him leade them into what part of the world he would. When they had granted their goodwilles, it was no hard matter afterwardes, to winne the rest of the common sorte who followed the example of the chiefest. Thereuppon he did frame himselfe the more to liue after the fashion of the countrie there, and enterchangeably also to bring the men of that countrie vnto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being perswaded that by this mixture and

and enterchange of manners one with another, he ſhould by friendſhippe more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he ſhould be ſo far from the countrie of PERSIA. For this purpoſe therefore, he choſe thirty thouſand of their children of that countrie, & ſet them to learne the Greek tongue, and to be brought vp in the diſcipline of warres, after the MACEDONIANS maner: and gaue them ſchoolemaſters and Captains to traine them in each facultie. And for the marying of Roxane, he fancied her, ſeing her at a feaſt where he was: which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduiſe and counſell loued her. For the barbarous people were very proude of this match when as they ſawe him make alliance with them in this ſorte, inſomuch as they loued him better then they did before, becauſe they ſaw in thoſe things he was alwaies ſo chaſt and continent, that notwithſtanding he was maruellouſly in loue with her, yet he would not diſhonorably touch this young Ladie, before he was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander conſidering that of the two men which he loued beſt, Hephæſtion liked well of his match, and went apparelled as himſelfe did, and that Craterus, contrarily did ſtill vſe the MACEDONIAN maner: he delt in all affaires with the barbarous people, by Hephæſtion, & with the GRECIANS and MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be ſhort, he loued the one, and honored the other: ſaying that Hephæſtion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereuppon theſe two perſons bare one another grudge in their hartes, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inſomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drewe their ſwords and fought together, and diuers of their friendes ranne to take part with either ſide. Thither came Alexander ſelfe alſo, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephæſtion, and called him foole and bedlem, ſaying, doſt thou not know, that whatſoeuer he be that ſhould take Alexander from me, he ſhould neuer liue? Priuatly alſo, he ſharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them friendes together, ſwearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing, neuertheles if euer he founde that they fell out together againe, they ſhould both dye for it, or him at the leaſt that firſt beganne to quarrell. So euer after that, they ſay there was neuer foule word nor deede betwene them, not ſo much as in ſport only. There was alſo one Philotas, the ſonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next vnto Alexander was the moſt valiant man, the patienteſt to abide paine, the liberalleſt, and one that loued his men and frends better then any noble man in the campe whatſoeuer. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borow money: and he commanded ſtraight one of his men to let him haue it. His purſebearer anſwered him, that he had none. Why, ſayed his maſter, doeſt thou tell me ſo? Haſt thou not plate, and apparell to ſell or gage to helpe him to ſome? Howbeit otherwiſe, he had ſuch a pride and glorie to ſhew his riches, to apparel himſelf ſo ſumptuouſly, and to be more fine and princked then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: becauſe he tooke vpon him to be a great man, and to looke big on the matter, which became him ill fauoredly, and therfore euery man through his owne folly, fell in miſliking with him. Inſomuch as his owne father ſayd one day vnto him: ſon I pray thee be more humble & lowly. This Philotas had long before bene cõplained vpon vnto Alexander becauſe that when the cariage of king Darius armie (which was in the citie of DAMAS) was taken after the battell of CILICIA, among many priſoners that were taken and brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a paſſing faier young curtiſan, born in the citie of PIDNA. Philotas founde meanes to get her, and like a young man that was in loue with her, making merie with her at the table, fondely lette fall braue wordes and boaſtes of a ſouldier ſaying that what notable things were done, they were done by himſelfe and his father: and called Alexander at euerie word, young man, and ſayed that by their meanes he helde his name and kingdome. This curtiſan tolde one of his friendes what he ſayed, and that friend tolde an other friende, and ſo went from man to man (as commonly it doeth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the curtiſan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom ſhe told as much as ſhe had ſayd before. Alexander bad her ſtill make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he ſayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circũuented, did euer frequent her companie, and would be bold commonly to ſpeake many fooliſh and vndiſcreet words againſt the king, ſomtime in anger, and ſomtime again in a brauery

Why Philotas was ſuſpected and enuied of Alexander.

Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he dissembled it for that time, and would not be knowen of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affrayed of their great power and authoritie. About that time there was one Limnus Chalæstrian a MACEDONIAN, that layd great and secret wait to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, entised him to help him to doe this deed. The young man wisely denied it, & told the same to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexãder, for they had a matter of great importance to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hand, and was not at leasure. Then they went vnto another, and he brought them vnto Alexander, vnto whom first they opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: and by the waye they tolde also, how they had bene twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with them. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slaine by him, whom he sent to apprehend him, resisting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this treason and conspiracie. Then Alexander frowning vppon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they beganne to speake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalæstrian of himselfe durst haue entred into that treason, but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, set on by a greater personage then he: and therefore that it stood Alexander vpon to examine them straightly, which had cause to keepe this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such wordes and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought a thousand accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuers Lordes and familiars of the king put to the torture, Alexander selfe being behinde a hanging, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he heard howe faintly and pittifully he besought Hephæstion to take pittie on him, he sayed vnto himselfe: alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a hart, howe durst thou take vppon thee so great matters? In fine, Philotas was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speed vnto the realme of MEDIA to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenaunt there, and one that had serued king Philippe his father, in his greatest affaires, and he onely of all other the olde seruantes of his father had procured Alexander to take in hande the conquest of ASIA: and who also of three sonnes which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and after wardes was slaine himselfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his friends affraied of him and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadors vnto the ÆTOLIANS, to make league with them, because they themselues also were affrayed of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that, sayed, that he himselfe, and not the sonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged on the ÆTOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitus, the which to heare it simplie tolde, would seeme much more cruell than the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chaunced: it will be found that it was not of sette purpose, but by chaunce and vnfortunately, that Alexander being ouercome with wine, did vnluckely wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the low countries from the sea side, that brought apples of GRECE vnto Alexander. Alexander, wondering to see them so greene and fayer, sent for Clitus to shew him them, and to giue him some of them. Clitus by chaunce did sacrifice at that time vnto the goddes, and left his sacrifice to goe vnto Alexander: howbeit, there were three weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprincklings had bene done alreadie to haue sacrificed them. Alexander vnderstanding that, tolde it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN, both did aunswere him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander thereuppon gaue order straight, that they shoulde doe sacrifice for the health of Clitus, and specially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he saw Clitus in a mourning gowne, sitting amongest the sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an ende of his sacrifice, but came came straight to supper to the king, who had that day sacrificed vnto Castor and Pollux. At this feast there was old drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses song and made by a Poet, called Pranichus, (or as others say, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people, and onely to shame them, and to make the companie laugh. With these verses, auncient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grew angrie with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that song them. Alexander on the other side, and his familiars liked them verie well, and commaunded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus there withall being ouertaken with wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proude and arrogant, fell into greater choller, and sayd: that it was neither well nor honestlie done in that sort to speake ill of those poore MACEDONIAN Captaines (and specially amongst the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they, that laughed them to scorne, although their fortune much worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and sayd, that saying so, he pleaded for himselfe, calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing vp, sayd againe: but yet this my cowardlinesse saued thy life, that callest thy selfe the sonne of the goddes, when thou turnedst thy backe from Spithridates sword: & the bloud which these poore MACEDONIANS did shed for thee, and the woundes which they receiued of their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needes make thy selfe the sonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with these wordes, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these proude wordes of thine, which thou vsest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS rebell against Alexander? Clitus aunswered againe, too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and seruice to receiue such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with rods of the MEDES, and compelled to curry fauour with the PERSIANS, to haue accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe aunswering and reuiling him: the graueſt men sought to pacifie this sturre and tumult. Alexander then turning himselfe vnto Xenodochus CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: do you not thinke (sayd he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as demy goddes that walke among brute beastes? Clitus for all this would not giue ouer his impudencie and malaperteneſſe, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openly what he had to say, or else not to bidde free men come to suppe with him that were wont to speake franckely: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues that honoured his PERSIAN girdle, and long white garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choller, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, and threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euery man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly rose from the borde, and called his gard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN toung, (which was a signe of great trouble to follow after it) and commaunded the trumpeter to sound the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not sound: whereupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trumpetter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his friendes with much a do thrust him out of the hall: but he came in againe at another doore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedie:

Why Alexander slue Clitus.

Alexanders dreame of Clitus.

Alas for sorrow, euill wayes Are into Græce crept now a dayes.

The malaperteneſſe of Clitus against Alexander.

Then Alexander taking a partisan from one of his gard, as Clitus was comming towardes him, and had lift vp the hanging before the doore, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, dyed presently. Alexanders choller had left him straight, and he became maruellous sorowfull: and when he saw his friends round about him neuer a word, he pluckt the partisan out of his body, & would haue thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his gard about him caught him by the hands, & caried him perforce into his chamber: & there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, & the next day following, vntill such time as he was able to crie no more, but lying on the ground, onely lay sighing. His friendes hearing his voyce no more, were afrayed, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, sauing Aristander the Soothsayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was, a prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destenie before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander. Afterwards they brought in Callisthenes the Philosopher, a kinsman of Aristotles, and Anaxarchus borne in ABDERA. Of these two, Callisthenes sought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensiue to comfort Alexanders sorow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by himselfe in the studie of Philosophie, being accounted a braine sicke man, and one that despised his companions: he comming into Alexanders chamber also with him, cryed out at the doore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afrayed of. See where he lyes, weeping like a slaue on the ground, that is afrayed of the law, and of the reproche of men: as if he himselfe should not giue them law, and stablish the boundes of iustice or iniustice, sithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and maister, and not to be subiect and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Iupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and iustice placed of either hand on him? what signifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is wholy right, and iust? These wordes of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorowfull hart of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwardes more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did maruellously grow in fauour with the king, euen so did he make the company of Callisthenes, (who of himselfe was not very pleasaunt: because of his grauitie and sowrenesse) much more hatefull and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certaine talke one night at king Alexanders borde touching the seasons of the yeare, & temperatnesse of the ayre, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which mainteined, that the country they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in GRECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stifly mainteined it, in somuch as Callisthenes sayd vnto him: and yet must thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there all the winter time thou couldest go with a single cloke on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy borde. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, and made him more angry then before: and for the other rethoritians and flatterers, they did also hate him, becausethey saw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued also of old men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, and contented with his owne, desiring no mans else. Whereby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in this voyage, was true: for he sayd that he came to be an humble suter to the king to restore his banished citizens into their country againe, and to replenish their citie with inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuyed, yet did he himselfe giue his enemies occasion to accuse him. For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, shewing by his grauitie and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either sayd or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe sayd on a time vnto him:

Callisthenes & Anaxarchus, do comfort Alexander.

The cause why Callisthenes was enuyed.

I can not thinke that person wise,
That in his owne case hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diuers requesting him to make an Oration on the sodaine in commendation of the MACEDONIANS: he made such an eloquent Oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the borde, and clapping their handes for ioy, cast nosegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time sayd vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides sayd:

It is no maistrie to be eloquent,
In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faultes, they may learne to amend. Then Callisthenes chaunging copie, spake boldly many things against the MACEDONIANS. Declaring, that the dissention amongst the GRECIANS did increase king Philips power, alledging these verses:

Where

VVhere discord reignes in Realme or towne, Euen wicked folke do win renowne.

But by this occasion, he purchased himselfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: in so much, as Alexander selfe said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the historiographer writeth that one Strebus a clearke of Callisthenes did afterwards tell it vnto Aristotle in this sort: and that Callisthenes seeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite these verses of Homer three or foure times as he went.

Patroclus who farre passed thee, VVas slaine as thou art like to be.

And therefore very wisely said Aristotle, that Callisthenes was eloquent, but not wise. For like a philosopher, he stoutly stood against kneeling to the king, and said that openly, which the noblest & ancientest men amõg the MACEDONIANS durst but whisper one in an others eare, though they did all vtterly mislike it: whereby hee did yet deliuer GRECE from open shame, & Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his person. This notwithstanding, he vndid himselfe because he would seeme rather by presumption to bring him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath writen, that Alexander hauing drunke at a certaine feast where he hapned to be, reached his cuppe vnto one of his friendes, who after he had taken it of him, rose vp first on his feete, and dranke also, turning him towards the goddes, and first making solemne reuerence, hee went and kissed Alexander, and then sate him downe againe. All the rest that were at the feast, did the like one after an other, and Callisthenes also, who tooke the cuppe when it came to his turne (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephæstion) after he had drunke, came to the king to kisse him as others had done. Howbeit one Demetrius called Phidon, said vnto the king: kisse him not, I pray your grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head a side, and would not kisse him. Then cryed Callisthenes out aloud: well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with lesse then others, by a kisse. And thus beganne Alexanders grudge first against Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephæstion was credited the better, when he said that Callisthenes had promised him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promise. After him also Lysimachus, Agnon, and diuers others beganne to play their partes against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging vp and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole tyrannie, and that all the young men followed him to honor him, as if among so many thousand souldiers, neuer a man of them had so noble a heart as he. And therefore, when the treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discouered, they found the accusation probable, the which some false detracters had informed against Callisthenes: who had answered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be famous aboue all men, thus: in killing the famousest person. And to animate him to goe forward with this treason, he had told him further, that he should not be affraide of a golden bedde, but remember that he had to doe with a man, which was sometime sicke & hurt as other men were. This notwithstanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Callisthenes, what tormentes soeuer they abidde, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander selfe also writing of this treason immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas said, that their seruantes which had bene racked and put to the torter, did constantly affirme that they onely had conspired his death, and no man els was priuie vnto it. But afterwardes, he sent an other letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and saide, that his seruantes had already bene stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS, howbeit that he himselfe would afterwardes also punish the master, and those that had sent vnto him, and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainely shewed the ill will he bare vnto Aristotle, for that Callisthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinsman, and the sonne of Hero, Aristotles neece. Some say, that Alexander trussed Callisthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of sickenesse in prison. Neuertheles Chares writeth, that Callisthenes was kept prisoner seuen moneths together, because he should haue had his iudgement in open councell euen in the presence of Aristotle himselfe: howbeit, being very fatte, he was eaten in the end by lyce, and so dyed, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the cõqueſt of INDIA, but theſe things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great deſire to go ſee Alexander: and when he had ſeene him, he ſayd that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were depriued of that bliſſe and happineſſe, that they could not ſee Alexander ſit in the royall ſeate of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kings good will vnto him, for he died of a ſickneſs ſoone after he came vnto his campe, & Alexander did honour his funerals: for all the army in their armour did caſt vp a mount of earth faſhioned like a tombe, which was a great compaſſe about, and foure ſcore cubits high. His aſhes afterwardes were brought with an honourable conuoy, vnto the ſea ſide, in a charriot with foure horſes richly ſet out.

The iourney of Demaratus Corinthiã vnto Alexander, and his death.

Alexander being ready to take his iourney to go conquer INDIA, perceiuing that his armie was very heauy & vnwildſom to remoue, for the wonderfull cariage & ſpoiles they had with them: the cartes one morning being loden, he firſt burnt his owne cariage, & next his friends, & then commaunded that they ſhould alſo ſet the cariage of the MACEDONIANS a fire, which counſell ſeemed more daungerous to be reſolued of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficulte. For there are very few of them that were angry therewith, & the moſt part of them (as if they had bene ſecretly moued by ſome god) with loude cryes of ioy, one of them gaue vnto an other ſuch neceſſary things as they had neede of, and afterwardes of themſelues did burne and ſpoyle all the reſt. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, beſides that he was already become cruell enough, and without mercy or pardon, did ſharpely puniſh euery man that offended. For hauing commaunded Menander one of his friends, to keepe him a ſtrong hold: he put him to death, becauſe he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himſelfe ſlue Orſodates (a Captaine of the barbarous people) with a dart, for that he rebelled againſt him. About that time, there was an eawe that had eaned a lambe, which had vpon her head, the forme and purple colour of the kings hat, after the PERSIAN manner called Tiara, hauing two ſtones hanging on ech ſide of it. Alexander abhorred this monſtrous ſigne, in ſomuch as he purged himſelfe by certaine BABILONIAN Prieſts, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpoſe, and ſayd vnto his friends: that this monſter did not ſo much moue him for reſpect of himſelfe, as it did for them, fearing that the goddes after his death had predeſtined the force and power of his kingdome to fall into the hands of ſome baſe cowardly perſon. This notwithſtanding, an other ſigne and token which chaunced in the necke of that, did take away this feare and diſcouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kings cariage, as he digged in a certaine place by the riuer of Oxus, to ſet vp the kings tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oylie vaine, which after they had drawen out the firſt, there came out alſo an other clearer, which differed nothing, neither in ſmell, taſt, nor ſauour: from naturall oyle, hauing the gloſſe and fatneſſe ſo like, as there could be diſcerned no difference between them: the which was ſo much more to be wõdred at, becauſe that in all that coũtry there were no olyues. They ſay alſo, that the water of the riuer ſelfe of Oxus is very ſoft, and maketh their skinnes fat, which waſh or bath themſelues therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander ſelfe wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongſt the greateſt ſignes which the goddes had ſent vnto him. The Soothſayers did interprete this wonder, that it was a ſigne, that he ſhould haue a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the goddes, ſayd they, haue giuen oyle vnto men to refreſh their wearineſſe. And truly ſo did he ſuſteine many daungers in thoſe warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greateſt loſſe he had of his men, was for lacke of victuals, and by the infection of the ayre. For he, ſtriuing to ouercome fortune by valiantneſſe, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impoſsible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withſtand a noble hart. It is reported, that when he went to beſiege a ſtrong hold which Siſimethres kept, being thought vnſaltable, and that his ſouldiers were in diſpaire of it: he asked one Oxyarthes, what hart Siſimethres had. Oxyarthes anſwered him, that he was the verieſt coward in the world. O, that is well, quoth Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou ſayeſt ſithence the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it of a ſodaine, by putting Siſimethres in a great feare. After that alſo, he did beſiege an other peece of as great ſtrength, and difficultie difficultie to assault as the other, and making the yong souldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the assault, he called one of them vnto him, whose name also was Alexander, vnto whom he said thus. Alexander, this day thou must fight like a man, and it be but for thy name sake. The yong man did not forget his words, for he fought so valiantly, that he was slaine, for whom Alexander was very sory. Another time whē his men were affraid, & durst not come neere vnto the city of NISA to assault it, because there ranne a very deepe riuer hard by the walles: he came to the riuers side, and said: oh, what a coward am I, that neuer learned to swimme? and so prepared himselfe to swimme ouer vpon his shield. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came ambassadors vnto him from the cities besieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondered at him at the first, when they saw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaire was brought him to sit downe on, that he commaunded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and sit him downe. Acuphis maruelling at Alexanders great courtesie, asked him: what they should do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, said Alexander, that they from whom thou comest as ambassador vnto vs, do make thee their King: and withall that they do send me a hundred of their best men for hostages. Acuphis smiling, answered him again: but I shall rule them better, O king, if I send you the worst, and not the best. There was a king called Taxiles a very wise man, who had a great country in INDIA, no lesse in bignesse and circuit then all ÆGYPT, and as full of good pasture and fruites as any country in the worlde could be: who came on a time to salute Alexander, and said vnto him. What should we neede, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with an other, if thou comest not to take away our water, and our necessary commoditie to liue by: for which things, men of iudgement must needes fight? As for other goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readie to giue thee of mine: and if I haue lesse, I will not thinke scorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me some of thine. Alexander being pleased to heare him speake thus wisely, imbraced him, and said vnto him. Thinkest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these goodly faire wordes? no, no, thou hast wonne nothing by that: for I will fight and contend with thee in honestie and courtesie, because thou shalt not exceede me in bountie and liberalitie. So Alexander taking diuers giftes of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles: he dranke to him one night at supper, and said, I drinke to thee a thousand talents in gold. This gift misliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of those barbarous Lordes and Princes of that countrie. There was a certaine number of souldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikest men of all that countrie: who being mercenary souldiers, were euer entertained in seruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a citie where they were kept in: when they came abroad vpon suertie of this peace which they had made, hee met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sword. There was but this only fault, to blemish the honor of his noble deedes in all his warres: for in all things else, he shewed mercie and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philosophers and wise men of INDIA did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kings and princes of the INDIANS for that they yeelded vnto Alexander, and procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke diuers of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his actes at large which he did against him. For he saith, that both their campes lying on either side of the riuer of Hydaspes, king Porus set his Elephants vpon the banke of the riuer with their heades towardes their enemies, to keepe them from passing ouer: and that he himselfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be affraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, & the choice of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Ilande. When he was come into the Ilande, there fell a wonderfull shower of raine, great windes, lightnings and thunders vppon his campe, insomuch as he sawe many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Ilande. This notwithstanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other side of the riuer. The riuer being swollen with the great flud of raine that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: so that Alexander when he had passed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other side, found himselfe ill very in case, for that he could hardly keepe his feete, because the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery side. It is written of him that then he said vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take such paines, and put my selfe into so many dangers, onely to be praised of you? Thus Onesicritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of tymber pinned together whereuppon they had passed ouer the streame of the mayne riuer: and that they waded thorow the other arme or gut of the water which had broken the earth, vppe to their breasts with their harnesse on their backes. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footemen: thinking that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also aduance their footemen forwarde, that his footemen also should come time enough. One of the twaine fell out as he had gessed. For, a thousande horsemen and three score charrets armed with his enemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, & slew foure hundred of the men of armes in the field. King Porus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the riuer: he marched towardes him with all his armie in battell ray, sauing a few which he left behind to resist the MACEDONIANS, if they shewed force to passe ouer the riuer. Alexander being affraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not giue charge vpon the middest of the battell, but being himselfe in the left wing, gaue charge vpon the corner of the enemies left wing, and also commaunded them that were in the right wing to doe the like. So, both the endes of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne vnto the Elephants, & gathered themselues together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, insomuch as the enemies were scantly all ouerthrowen by three of the clocke in the afternoond.

The stature of king Porus. The quicke wit and care of the Elephant to saue the king his maister.

Many writers doe agree, that Porus was foure cubites and a shaft length hier and bigger then the Elephant, although the Elephant was very great, and as bigge as a horse: and besides that the Elephant did shew great wit and care, to saue the king his master. For whilest he perceiued his Maister was strong enough, he lustily repulsed those which came to assaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many woundes vpon his body, and arrowes sticking in it: then being affraid lest his Maister should fall downe from his backe, he softly fell on his knees, and gently taking his dartes and arrowes with his truncke, which he had in his bodie, he pluckt them all from him one after an other. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he should handle him, princely, answered Porus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would say any thing else. I comprehend all, said he, in this word princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and Realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieutenant: but gaue him many other countryes also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene seuerall nations, fiue thousande of no small cities, besides an infinite number of villages, and thrise as many other countries: he made Philip one of his friendes, his Lieutenant of all those countries. His horse Bucephall died at this battell, not in the field, but afterwardes whilest he was in cure for the woundes he had on his bodie: but as Onesicritus saieth, he dyed euen worne for very age. Alexander was as sorie for his death, as if he had lost any of his familiar friends: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horse was buryed, vppon the riuer of Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, Bucephalia. It is reported also, that hauing lost a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vppe of a whelpe, and loued very dearely: he built also a citie, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This last battell against king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no desire to goe any further to conquere INDIA. For, finding that they had such a doe to ouercome them, though they were but twentie thousande footemen, and two thousand horse, they spake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe ouer the riuer of Ganges, vnderstanding by the country men that it was two and thirtie furlong ouer, and a hundred fadam deepe: and howe that the banke of the riuer was full full of souldiers, horsemen, & Elephants. For it was reported, that the kings of the GANGARIDES, & the PRÆSIANS were on the other side with foure score thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand footemen, eight thousand charrets or carts of warre well armed, and six thousand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor friuolous tale. For, a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after,) gaue vnto Seleucus, fiue hundred Elephants at one time, & conquered all INDIA with six hundred thousand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refusall, kept close in his tent for certaine dayes, and lay vpon the ground, saying, that he did not thanke them, for all that they had done thitherunto, vnlesse they passed ouer the riuer of Ganges also, and that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confesse that he had bene ouercome. At the length, when he saw and considered that there was great reason in his friends perswasions which laboured to comfort him, and that his souldiers came to the doore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beseeching him to lead them backe againe: in the end he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithstanding, before he departed from those parties, he put forth many vaine and false deuises to make his name immortall among that people. He made armours of greater proportion then his owne; and rangers for horses, higher then the common sort: moreouer, he made byts also farre beauier then the common sort, and made them to be throwen and scattered abroad in euery place. He built great aultars also in honor of the gods, the which the kings of the PRÆSIANS haue in great veneration at this day: and passing ouer the riuer, do make sacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcotus at that time was a very young man, and saw Alexander himselfe, and sayd afterwards, that Alexander had well neare taken & wonne all the country, the king which then raigned, was so hated of all his subiectes, for his wicked life, and base parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to see the great sea Oceanum, and made diuers bores with ores, in the which he easily went downe the riuers at his pleasure. Howbeit, this his pleasant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and did assaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in assailing the citie of the MALLIANS, (which they say are the warlikest mē of all the INDIANS) he was almost slaine there. For, hauing with darts repulsed the enemies from the wall, he himselfe was the first man that set foote on a ladder to get vp, the which brake assoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. Then the barbarous people comming together against the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing few of his men about him, made no more a do, but leaped downe from the wall in the middest of his enemies, and by good hap lighted on his feete. His harnesse making a great noyse with the fall, the barbarous people were afrayed, thinking they had seene some light or spirite go before him: so that at the first they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne scatteringly here and there. But after that, when they came againe to themselues, and saw that he had but two gentlemen onely about him, they came and set vpon him of all handes, and fought with him at the sword or push of the pyke, and so hurt him very sore through his armour: but one among the rest, being somewhat farther off, gaue him such a terrible blow with an arrow, that he strake him through his curats, and shot him in at the side vnder his brest. The blow entred so into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had striken him with his arrow, ran sodainly to him with a cimiter drawen in his hand. Howbeit as Peucest and Limnæus stepped before him, and were both hurt: Limnæus was slaine presently, and Peucestas fought it out, till at the length, Alexander selfe slue the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many greeuous woundes vpon his body. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke that so astonied him, that he leaned against the wall looking vpon his enemies. In the meane time, the MACEDONIANS compassing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a sound, and was past knowledge: Whereupon, there ranne a rumour straight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a do to cut the arrow asunder that was of wood: so his curats being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his body, which stucke in one of his bones: the which as it is reported, was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he sounded so oft, that he was almost dead. This notwithstanding, he ouercame the daunger, and escaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer himselfe, and neuer came out of his tent: vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, & made great noyse about his tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night gowne, and came out amongst them all: and after he had done sacrifice vnto the goddes for recouery of his health, he went on his iourney againe, and in the same did conquer many great countryes, and tooke diuers goodly cities. He did also take ten of the wise men of the country, which men do all go naked, and therfore are called GYMNOSOPHISTAE (to wit, Philosophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, & had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And because they were taken to be the sharpest & readiest of answer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard questions, and told them he would put the first man to death, that aunswered him worst, and so the rest in order: and made the eldest among them Iudge of their answers. The question he asked the first man, was this:

The wise men of India.

1 Whether the dead or the liuing, were the greater number. He aunswered, the liuing. For the dead sayd he, are no more men.

2 The second man he asked: whether the earth, or the sea brought forth most creatures. He aunswered, the earth. For the sea sayd he, is but a part of the earth.

3 To the third man: which of all beastes was the subtileſt. That (sayd he) which man hitherto neuer knew.

4 To the fourth: why he did make Sabbas rebell? becauſe sayd he, he should liue honourably or dye vilely.

5 To the fift, which he thought was first, the day, or the night? He answered, the day, by a day. The king finding his aunswer straunge, added to this speach: straunge questions, must needes haue straunge aunswers.

6 Comming to the sixt man, he asked him: how a man should come to be beloued: If he be a good man sayd he, not terrible.

7 To the seuenth, how a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man.

8 To the eight, which was the strōger: life or death? life, said he, that suffreth so many troubles.

9 And vnto the ninth and last man: how long a man should liue? vntill sayd he, he thinke it better to dye, then to liue.

When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned vnto the Iudge, & bad him giue his iudgemēt vpon thē. The Iudge said, they had all answered one worse then another. Then shalt thou dye first, said Alexander, becauſe thou hast giuē such sentence: not so, O king, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer: becauſe thou saidst, that thou wouldest kill him first, that had answered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He sent Oneſicritus also vnto the other wise mē of the INDIANS, which were of greateſt fame amōg thē, & that led a solitary & quiet life: to pray thē to come vnto him. This Oneſicritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cinikes scholler. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise mē, very sharply & proudly bad him put off his cloths, to heare his words naked: or otherwise that he would not speake to him, though he came from Iupiter himselfe. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he hauing learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, & Diogenes were, said: that they seemed to haue bene wise men, & well borne, notwithstanding that they had reuerenced the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithstāding, that Dandamis said nothing els, but asked why Alexāder had takē so painful a iourney in hād, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus, (whose right name otherwise was Sphines) king Taxiles perswaded him to go vnto Alexāder: who becaus he saluted those he met, in the INDIAN toung, saying Cale, as God saue you: the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexāder a figure & similitude of his kingdom, which was this. He threw down before him a dry seare peece of leather, & then put his foote vpō one of the ends of it. The leather being trodē down on that side, rose vp in all parts else, & going vp & down with all still treading vpō the sides of the leather he made Alexāder see, that the leather being trodē down on the one side, did rise vp of all sides else, vntill such time as he put his foote in the middest of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plaine alike. His meaning thereby, was to let Alexāder vnderstand, that the most part of his time he should keepe in the middest of his country, & not to go farre from it. Alexander continued seuen months trauelling vpon the riuers, to go see the great sea Oceanum. Then he

Then he made his prayers vnto the gods,that no cõquerour liuing after him ſhould go beyond the bounds of his iourney & conqueſt,& ſo returned homward. He cõmaunded his ſhips ſhould fetch a cõpaſſe about,& leaue INDIA on the right hand:& made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleete, & Oneſicritus chiefe Pilote. He himſelf in the meane time went by land through the country of the ORITES,& there he found great ſcarſitie of victuals,& loſt many of his mẽ: ſo that he caried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his mẽ of war which he brought thither,which were in all, ſix ſcore thouſand footemẽ,& fifteen thouſand horſemen. Some of thẽ died of greeuous diſeaſes, others, by ill diet,others, by extreme heat & drought,and the moſt of them by hunger,trauailing through this barren country,where the poore men liued hardly,& had only a few ſheepe which they fed with ſea fiſh,that made their fleſh ſauor very ill fauoredly. At the lẽgth,when in three ſcore dayes iourney he had painfully trauelled through this countrey, he thẽ entred into the coũtry called GEDROSIA,where he foũd great plẽty of all kind of victuals,which the gouernours,kings,& princes,neighbours vnto the ſame,did ſend vnto him. After he had refreſhed his army there a litle, he went through the coũtry of CARMANIA, where he continued ſeuen dayes together banketing,going ſtill through the coũtry. For night & day,he was feaſting cõtinually with his friends vpon a ſcaffold lõger then broad, riſing vp of height, & drawen with eight goodly horſe. After that ſcaffold followed diuers other charrets couered ouer,ſome with goodly rich arras,& purple ſilke, others with trim freſh boughes which they renued at euery fields end:& in thoſe were Alexanders other friends & Captaines with garlands of flowers vpon their heades,which dranke & made mery together. In all this army, there was neither helmet,pike,dart,nor target ſeene:but gold & ſiluer bowles,cups, & flagons in the ſouldiers hãds, all the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes and veſſels which they caried with them,one drinking to another,ſome marching in the fields going forward,& others alſo ſet at the table. About thẽ were the minſtrels playing & piping on their flutes & ſhalmes, & women ſinging & daunſing,& fooling by the way as they wẽt. In all this diſſolute marching through the coũtry,& in the middeſt of their drunkẽnes,they mingled with it ſport:that euery man did ſtriue to coũterfeit all the inſolẽcies of Bacchus,as if god Bacchus himſelf had bene there in perſon,& had led the mommery. When he came vnto the kings caſtle of GEDROSIA,he ſtayed there alſo certaine dayes to refreſh his army with feaſting & banqueting. It is ſayd, that one day when he had drunke hard,he went to ſee the games for daunſing & amongſt them, the games which a young man called Bagoas had ſet forth,(with whom Alexander fell in liking,and bare the bell. This Bagoas being in his daunſing garments, came through the Theater,and ſat him downe by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were ſo glad of it, that they ſhouted and clapped their hands for ioy,crying out aloud,to kiſſe him:So that in fine he tooke him in his armes, & kiſſed him,before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him: who made report what he had ſeene and done in his nauigatiõ. Alexander was ſo glad of that,as he was deſirous to ſayle by ſea himſelfe:and ſo,entring into the ſea Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates,with a great fleete of ſhips,to cõpaſſe in all the coaſts of ARABIA & AFRICKE,& thence into Mare Mediterraneũ,by the ſtraights of the pillers of Hercules. To this intent he built a great nũber of ſhips in the citie of THAPSACVS,& ſent for mariners,ſhipmaſters,& Pilotes, out of all parts. But now, the difficultie of the iourney which he tooke vpon him for the conqueſt of INDIA, the danger he was in whẽ he fought with the MALLIANS,& the nũber of his men which he loſt beſides which was very great,all theſe things cõſidered together,making mẽ beleeue that he ſhould neuer returne with ſafetie:they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to riſe againſt him,& gaue his gouernours & Lieutenãts of prouinces occaſion to cõmit great inſolẽcies,robberies,& exactiõs of people. To be ſhort,it put all his kingdome in broile & ſedition. In ſomuch as Olympias & Cleopatra riſing againſt Antipater, they deuided his gouernemẽt betweene thẽ: Olympias choſing for her,the kingdome of EPIRVS: & Cleopatra,the kingdome of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard,he ſaid his mother was the wiſeſt: for the realme of MACEDON would neuer haue ſuffred a womã to raigne ouer thẽ. Therupõ he ſent

Nearchus backe again to the sea, determining to fill all the sea coasts with war. As he trauelled through the countrys far frō the sea, he put his Captaines & gouernors to death, which had reuolted against him: & of those he slue Oxyarthes, one of Abulites sons, by his own hād, running him through with a pike. And whē Abulites self also had brought Alexāder iij. thousand talents only, without any other prouision made for victuals for his army: he made him put the money before his horse, which would not once touch it. Then sayd he vnto him: I pray thee to what purpose serueth this prouisiō? & therewithall immediatly cōmitted him to prison. As he came through the country of PERSIA, he first renued the old custome there, which was: that as often times as the kings did returne home frō any far iourney, they gaue vnto euery womā a crown a peece. It is sayd therefore that for this cause, some of their naturall kings many times did not returne againe into their coūtry: & that Ochus amōgst others did not so much as once returne backe againe, willingly banishing himself out of his coūtry, of niggardlines, because he would not be at this charge. After that, Cyrus tombe (king of PERSIA) being foūd & brokē vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the citie of PELLA, (and none of the meanest) called Polymachus. Whē he had read the inscription writtē vpon it in the Persian toung, he would needes also haue it written in the Greeke toung: and this it was. O man, what so thou art, and whence soeuer thou cōmest, for I know thou shalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia, I pray thee enuie me not for this litle earth that couereth my body. These wordes pearced Alexanders hart, when he considered the vncertaintie of worldly things. There also, Calanus the INDIAN Philosopher, hauing had a flixe a litle while, praied that they would make him a stacke of wood, such as they vse to burne dead bodies on, & then rode thither a horse backe: & after he had made his prayer vnto the goddes, he cast those sprinklings vpō him, which were vsed to be sprinckled at the funerals of the dead. Then cutting off a lock of his haire before he went vp on the woodstacke, he bad all the MACEDONIANS that were there farewell, and shooke them by the hands, praying thē that day to be merry, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would see shortly after in the citie of BABYLON. Whē he had spoken these wordes, he layd him down vpon the woodstacke, couered his face, & neuer stirred hand nor foote, nor quenched when the fire tooke him, but did sacrifice himselfe in this sort, as the maner of his country was, that the wise mē should so sacrifice themselues. An other INDIAN also, who followed Iulius Cæsar, did the like many yeares after in the citie of ATHENS: & there is his tombe yet to be seene, cōmonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came frō seeing this sacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuers of his friends & Captaines to supper to him, & there did bring forth a crown for a reward vnto him that dranke best. He that dranke most of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure gallons of wine, & wan the crowne worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three dayes after. And of other also that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drink most, there died of thē (as Chares writeth) one & forty persons: of an extreme cold that tooke them in their drunkennesse & wine. When they were in the citie of SVSA, he married certaine of his friends, & himselfe also married Statira, one of king Darius daughters, disposing also of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their estate and birth) vnto his best friends. He made also a solēne feast of cōmon mariages amongst the MACEDONIANS, of them that had bene maried before. At which feast, it is writtē, that nine thousād persons sitting at the bords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honor of the gods. And there also amongst other wōderfull gifts, he did pay all the debts the MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditors, the which amounted vnto the summe of ten thousand talēts sauing a hundred & thirtie lesse. Wherupō Antigenes with one eye, falsly putting in his name amongst the nūber of the debters, & bringing in one that said he had lent him money: Alexāder caused him to be payd. But afterwardes, when it was proued to his face, that there was no such matter: Alexander then was so offended with him, that he banished him his court, & depriued him of his Captainship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed himselfe a valiant man in the warres. For whē he was but a yong mā, he was shot into the eye, before the citie of PERINTHE, which king Philip did besiege, and at that present time they would haue pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would suffer them to pull it out, before he had first driuē his enemies within the wals of their city. He tooke this infamy very inwardly, & he was so ty-ry for it, that euery mã might see he was like to die for sorow. Thẽ Alexander fearing he should die, did pardõ him, & bad him besides keep the money which was giuẽ him. Now the 30000. young boyes which Alexander had left to the gouernement of Captaines, to traine & exercise them in the discipline of warre: they being growen strong men, and lusty youthes, excellently well trained & ready in armes: Alexander reioyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS, & made thẽ greatly afrayd, because they thought that from thenceforth the king would make lesse account of thẽ. For when Alexander would haue sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low countrey, to the sea side: they aunswered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to send these poore men from him in that sort, (after they had done him all the seruice they could) home to their country & friends, in worse case thẽ he tooke them from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men vnseruiceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly yoũg daunsers about him, with whom he might go cõquer the world. Alexãder was maruellously offended with their proud words, in somuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary gard, & tooke other PERSIANS in their place, making some the gard about his owne person, others, his vshers, heraulds, and ministers to execute his will and commaundement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, & themselues so shamefully reiected: they let fall their stoutnesse, and after they had commoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare themselues for spite & malice. In fine when they had layd their heads together; they consẽted to go vnto his tent and without weapons, naked in their shirts to yeeld thẽselues vnto him weeping and howling, beseeching him to do with thẽ what pleased him, & to vse them like wretched vnthankfull creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somwhat pacified, did not receiue thẽ the first time, neither did they also go their wayes, but remained there two dayes & nights together, in this pitifull state, before the doore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their soueraigne and king, vntill that he came himselfe out of his tent the third day, and seeing the poore wretches in this greeuous and pitifull state, he himselfe fell a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked thẽ, he called thẽ curteously, & gaue the impotẽt & sick persons leaue to depart home, rewarding thẽ very honorably. Furthermore, he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should alwayes giue them the highest place in all cõmon sports and assemblies, and that they should be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreouer, he commaunded that the orphans whose parents were slaine in the wars, should receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the city of ECBATANA, in the kingdome of MEDEA, & that he had dispatched his waightiest causes: he gaue himselfe againe vnto publike sports, feasts, and pastimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of GREECE, three thousand excellent maisters & deuisers of such sports. About that time it chaunced, that Hephæstion fell sicke of an agew. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should haue done, but hauing spyed opportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports & pastimes: He went to dinner, & eate a roasted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereupon his feuer tooke him so sorely, that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chaunce of his death, & commaunded all the haires of his horse and mules to be presently shorne in token of mourning, and that all the battlemẽts of the wals of cities should also be ouerthrowen, and hung vp poore Glaucus his Phisitian vpon a crosse, and commaunded that no minstrell should be heard play of any kinde of instrument within his campe: vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, commaunding that Hephæstion should be worshipped and sacrificed vnto, as a demy god. In the end, to passe ouer his mourning and sorow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, & there subdued the people of the COSSÆIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and slue man, woman, and child. And this was called the sacrifice of Hephæstions funerals. Alexander furthermore being desirous to bestow ten thousand talents cost vpon his obsequies and fenerals, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenesse and excellencie of workemanship: amongest all other excellent workemaisters, he desired one Stasicrates, for he had euer passing inuention, and his worke was alwayes stately and sumptuous in any new things he tooke in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, told him, that of all the mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to resemble the statue or image of a man, then was mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his pleasure, he would make him the noblest and most durable image, that should be in the world, which in his left hand should hold a city to conteine ten thousand persons, and out of his right hand, there should runne a great riuer into the sea. Yet Alexander would not harkē to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more straunge inuentions, & far greater cost Now as he was ready to take his iourney to go vnto BABYLON: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates, and told him, how certaine CHALDEAN Soothsayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he should not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the wals of BABYLON, he saw a great number of crowes fighting & killing one of an other, & some of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwardes being told him that Apollodorus the gouernour of the citie of BABYLON, hauing sacrificed vnto the goddes, to know what should happē to him he sent for the soothsayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The soothsayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what signes he had in the sacrifice. He answered, that the liuer of the beast had no head. O gods, sayd Alexander then, this is an ill signe: notwithstanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repēted him that he did not beleeue Nearchus wordes. For this respect therfore Alexander lay much abroad in the country from BABYLON, and did take his pleasure rowing vp and downe the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill signes and tokens one vpon an other, that made him afrayed. For there was a tame asse that killed one of the greatest & goodliest Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feete. An other time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be nointed to play at tennis: When he should put on his apparell again, the young gētlemen that played with him, found a manket in his chaire of estate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, & his gowne on his back, & sayd neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them answer, but at the lēgth comming to himself, he said his name was Dionysius, borne in MESSINA: & being accused for certaine crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had bene a long time prisoner, & also that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, & vndone his irons, & that he commaunded him to take the kings gowne, & his diademe, and to sit him down in his chaire of estate, & say neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counsell of his Soothsayers: but then his minde was troubled, & feared that the gods had forsakē him, & also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexāder feared Antipater & his sonnes, aboue all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his first cupbearer: & his brother called Cassander, was newly come out of GREECE vnto him. The first time that Cassāder saw some of the barbarous people reuerēcing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the liberties of GREECE, & had neuer seene the like before: fell into a loude laughing very vnreuerētly. Therwith king Alexāder was so offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wall together. An other time also whē Cassander did answer some that accused his father Antipater: king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, & said vnto him. What saiest thou, said he? Doest thou thinke that these mē would haue gone so lōg a iourney as this, falsly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrōg? Cassander againe replyed vnto Alexāder, & said, that that was a manifest proofe of their false accusatiō, for that they did now accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and sayd, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & cōtra: but this will not saue you frō punishment, if I find that you haue done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Cassander tooke such an inward feare & conceit vpon it, that lōg time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GREECE at his commaundement: going vp & down the citie of DELPHES, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into such a sodaine feare, that the haires of his head stood vpright, and his body quaked in such sort, that it was a great time before he could come to himselfe againe. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the goddes, his minde was so troubled and afrayed, that no straunge thing happened vnto him, Diuers signes before Alexāders death.

(how how litle ſo euer it was) but he tooke it ſtraight for a ſigne and prediction from the goddes: ſo that his tent was alwayes full of Prieſtes and Soothſayers that did nothing but ſacrifice and purifie, and tend vnto diuinements. So horrible a thing is the miſtruſt and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men, and ſuperſtition alſo ſo dreadfull, that it filleth the guilty conſciences and fearefull harts like water diſtilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once poſſeſſed him. This notwithſtanding, after that he had receiued ſome anſwers touching Hephæſtion from the oracle of Iupiter Hammon beleft his ſorrow, and returned againe to his bankets and feaſting. For he did ſumptuoſly feaſt Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bathe according to his manner, being ready to goe to bed, Medius one of his Captaines beſought him to come to a banket to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, ſo that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as ſome write) by drinking vppe Hercules cuppe all at a draught: neither for the ſodaine paine he felt betweene his ſhoulders, as if hee had bene thruſt into the backe with a ſpeare. For all theſe were thought to be written by ſome, for lies and fables, becauſe they would haue made the end of this great tragedy lamentable and pitifull. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had ſuch an extream feuer and thirſt withall, that he drank wine, and after that fell a rauing, and at the length died the thirty day of the moneth of Iune. In his houſhold booke of things paſſed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he ſlept at his hotte-houſe on the eighteenth day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hotte-houſe, he went into his chamber, and paſſed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed him ſelfe and ſacrificed vnto the goddes, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day alſo, bathing him ſelfe againe, and making his ordinary ſacrifice to the goddes, he did ſitte downe to eate within his ſtooue, harkening vnto Nearchus that told him ſtrange things he had ſeene in the great ſea Oceanum. The one and twenty day alſo hauing done the like as before, hee was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt him ſelfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feuer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be ſet vp by the fiſhe pondes, where he commoned with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were vacant in his army, and commaunded them not to place any men that were not of good expectance. The three & twentieth day hauing an extream feuer vpon him, he was caried vnto the ſacrifices, and commanded that his chiefeſt Captaines onely ſhould remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner ſort, as centiniers or Lieutenaunts of bandes, that they ſhould watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on the other ſide of the lake, wher he ſlept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: & when his Captaines and noble men came to doe him humble reuerence, and to ſee him, he lay ſpeachles. So did he the fiue & twentieth day alſo: inſomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out vnto his friendes and familiars, and threatned them, ſo that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, and they comming in their gowns went vnto his bed ſide to ſee him. That ſelf day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to know if they ſhould bring king Alexander thither. The god anſwered them, that they ſhould not remoue him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the houſhold booke of remembrance. At that preſent time, there was no ſuſpition that he was poiſoned. Yet they ſay, that ſix yeares after, there appeared ſome proofe that he was poyſoned. Wherupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and caſt the aſhes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was ſaid he gaue him poyſon in his drinke. They that thinke it was Ariſtotle that counſelled Antipater to doe it, by whoſe meane the poiſon was brought: they ſay that Agnothemis reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus own mouth. The poyſon (as ſome ſay) was cold water, & falleth from a rock in the territory of the city of NONACRIS, & it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horne of the foote of an aſſe, for there is no other kinde of thing that will keepe it, it is ſo extreame cold and peareing. Others defend it, and ſay, that the report of his poyſoning is vntrue: and for proofe thereof they alledge this reaſon, which is of no ſmall importance,that is: That the chiefeſt Captaines fell at great variance after his death,ſo that the corps of Alexander remained many daies naked without buriall,in a whot dry country,and yet there neuer appeared any ſigne or token vpon his bodie,that he was poiſoned,but was ſtill a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honor: but ſhe did malice Statira extremely, & did finely deceiue her by a counterfaite letter ſhe ſent,as if it had come from Alexander,willing her to come vnto him.But when ſhe was come,Roxane killed her & her ſiſter,and then threw their bodies into a well,and filled it vp with earth,by Perdiccas helpe & conſent.Perdiccas came to be king immediatly after Alexanders death, by meanes of Aridæus, whom he kept about him for his gard and ſafety.This Aridæus,being borne of a ſtrumpet & common woman, called Philina, was halfe lunaticke,not by nature nor by chance: but as it is reported,put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes which Olympias cauſed to be giuen him,and thereby continued franticke.

Caſar ioyned with Cinna and Marius.

AT what time Sylla was made lord of all,he would haue had Caſar put away his wife Cornelia,the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he ſaw, he could neither with any promiſe nor threate bring him to it, he tooke her iointer away from him. The cauſe of Caſars ill will vnto Sylla,was by meanes of mariage: for Marius the elder, maried his brothers own ſiſter,by whom he had Marius the younger,whereby Caſar and he were coſin germaines. Sylla being troubled in waighty matters,putting to death ſo many of his enemies,when he came to be conqueror,he made no reckoning of Caſar: but he was not cõtented to be hidden in ſafetie, but came & made ſute vnto the people for the Prieſthoodſhip that was voide, when he had ſcant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulſed by *Sylla*s meanes, that ſecretly was againſt him. Who,when he was determined to haue killed him,ſome of his friends told him, that it was to no purpoſe to put ſo young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe,that they did not conſider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Caſar vnderſtanding that, ſtale out of ROME, and hid himſelfe a long time in the countrey of the SABINES, Sabines, wandring ſtil from place to place. But one day being caried from houſe to houſe, he fell into the handes of Syllaes ſouldiers, who ſearched all thoſe places, and tooke them whom they found hidden. Ceſar bribed the Captaine, whoſe name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had eſcaped them thus, he went vnto the ſea ſide and tooke ſhip, and ſailed into Bithynia to go vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he tooke ſea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of Pharmacvsa: for thoſe pyrates kept all vpon that ſea coaſt, with a great fleete of ſhips and botes. They asking him at the firſt twenty talents for his ranſome, Ceſar laughed them to ſcorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himſelfe promiſed them fiftie talents. Then he ſent his men vp and downe to get him this money, ſo that he was left in manner alone among theſe theeues of the Cilicians, (which are the cruelleſt butchers in the world) with one of his friends, & two of his ſlaues only: & yet he made ſo litle reckoning of them, that when he was deſirous to ſleepe, he ſent vnto them to command them to make no noiſe. Thus was he eight & thirtie daies among them, not kept as priſoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exerciſe himſelf in any ſport or paſtime they would go to. And other while alſo he would write verſes, and make orations, & call them together to ſay them before them: and if any of them ſeemed as though they had not vnderſtood him, or paſſed not for them, he called them blockheads and brute beaſts, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and tooke all in good part, thinking that this his bold ſpeech came, through the ſimplicity of his youth. So when his ranſome was come from the citie of Miletvm, they being paid their money, and he againe ſet at libertie: he then preſently armed, and manned out certaine ſhips out of the hauen of Miletvm, to follow thoſe theeues, whom he found yet riding at ancker in the ſame Iland. So he tooke the moſt of them, and had the ſpoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought the into the city of Pergamvm, & there committed them to priſon, whileſt he himſelfe went to ſpeake with Iunius, who had the gouernement of Asia, as vnto whom the execution of theſe pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that coutry. But this Prætor hauing a great fancy to be fingering of the money, becauſe there was good ſtore of it: anſwered, that he would conſider of theſe priſoners at better leaſure. Ceſar leauing Iunius there, returned againe vnto Pergamvm, and there hung vp all theſe theeues openly vpon a croſſe, as he had oftentimes promiſed the in the Ile he would do, when they thought he did but ieaſt. Afterwardes when Syllaes power began to decay, Ceſars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home again. But he ſailed firſt vnto Rhodes, to ſtudie there a time vnder Apollonius the ſonne of Molon, whoſe ſcholler alſo Cicero was, for he was a very honeſt man, and an excellent good Rethoritian. It is reported that Ceſar had an excellent natural gift to ſpeake well before the people, & beſides that rare gift, he was excellently well ſtudied, ſo that doubtleſſe he was counted the ſecond man for eloquence in his time, & gaue place to the firſt, becauſe he would be the firſt and chiefeſt man of warre and authoritie, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to ſpeake well, which his nature could haue performed in him, becauſe he was giuen rather to follow wars and to mannage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all Rome. And therefore in a booke he wrote againſt that which Cicero made in the praiſe of Cato, he praieth the readers not to compare the life of a ſouldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the moſt part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto Rome, he accuſed Dolabella for his ill behauior in the gouernment of his prouince, and he had diuers cities of Grece that gaue in euidence againſt him. Notwithſtanding, Dolabella at the length was diſmiſſed. Ceſar, to requite the good will of the Grecians, which they had ſhewed him in his accuſation of Dolabella, tooke their cauſe in hand, when they did accuſe Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of Macedon: and followed it ſo hard againſt him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at Rome, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could haue no iuſtice in Grece againſt the Grecians. Now Ceſar immediatly wan many mens good wils at Rome, through his eloquence, in pleading of their cauſes: and the people loued him maruellouſly alſo, becauſe of the courteous maner he had to ſpeake to euery man, and to vſe them gentlely, being more ceremonious therin then was looked for in one of his yeares.

Furthermore, he euer kept a good boord, and fared well at his table, and was very liberall beſides: the which indeede did aduance him forward, and brought him in eſtimation with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauour of the cõmon people would ſoone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence: ſuffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growen to be of great ſtrength and power. But in fine, when they had thus giuen him the bridle to grow to this greatneſſe, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in ſight it would turne one day to the deſtruction of the whole ſtate and common wealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not ſo litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will ſoone make it ſtrong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatneſſe. Thereupon, Cicero like a wiſe ſhipmaſter that feareth the calmeneſſe of the ſea, was the firſt man that miſtruſting his maner of dealing in the common wealth, found out his craft & malice, which he cunningly cloked vnder the habit of outward curtezie and familiaritie. And yet, ſaide he, when I conſider how finely he combeth his faire buſhie haire, & how ſmooth it lieth, & that I ſee him ſcratch his head with one finger only: my mind giues me then, that ſuch a kind of man ſhould not haue ſo wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth. But this was long time after that. The firſt ſhew and proofe of the loue and good will which the people did beare vnto Cæſar, was: when he ſued to be Tribune of the ſouldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thouſand footemen) ſtanding againſt Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and choſen before him. But the ſecond & more manifeſt proofe then the firſt, was at the death of his Aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder. For being her nephew, he made a ſolemne oration in the market place in commendation of her, and at her buriall did boldly venture to ſhew forth the images of Marius: the which was the firſt time that they were ſeene after Syllaes victorie, becauſe that Marius and all his confederates had bin proclaimed traitors & enemies to the common wealth. For when there were ſome that cried out vpon Cæſar for doing of it: the people on the other ſide kept a ſturre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their hands and thanked him for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honor againe into ROME, which had ſo long time been obſcured & buried. And where it had bin an ancient cuſtome of long time that the ROMANES vſed to make funerall orations in praiſe of old Ladies and matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cæſar was the firſt that praiſed his owne wife with funerall oration when ſhe was dead, the which alſo did increaſe the peoples good wils the more, ſeeing him of ſo kinde and gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treaſurer vnder Antiſtius the Prætor, whom he honored euer after: ſo that when himſelfe came to be Prætor, he made him ſonne to be choſen Treaſurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he married his third wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his firſt wife Cornelia, which was married vnto Pompey the great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as ſome thought) but a vaine and ſhort glory of the fauor of the people: (where indeede he bought good cheape the greateſt things that could be.) Some ſay, that before he bare any office in the common wealth he was growen in debt, to the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. Furthermore, becauſe he was made ouerſeer of the worke, for the high way going vnto Appius, he diſburſed a great ſumme of his owne money towardes the charges of the ſame. And on the other ſide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did ſhew the people the paſtime of three hundred & twentie couple of ſword plaiers, and did beſides exceede all other in ſumptuouſnes in the ſports & cõmon feaſts which he made to delight them withall: (& did as it were drowne all the ſtately ſhewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he ſo pleaſed the people, and wanne their loues therwith, that they deuiſed daily to giue him new offices for to require him. At that time there were two factiõs in ROME, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very ſtrõg & of great power, and the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote and durſt not ſhew it ſelfe. But Cæſar becauſe he would renue it again, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feaſts & cõmon ſports were in their greateſt ruffe: he ſecretly cauſed images of Marius to be made, & of victories that caried triumphs, & thoſe he ſet vp one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when euery man ſaw the gliſtering of theſe golden images excellently well wrought, ſhewing by the inſcriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won vpon the CIMBRES euery one maruelled much at the boldneſſe of him that durſt ſet them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ran ſtraight through all the citie, & euery man came thither to ſee them. Then ſome cried out vpon Cæſar, & ſaid it was a tyrannie which he ment to ſet vp, by renuing of ſuch honors as before had bene troden vnder foote, and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a baite to gage the peoples good wils, which he had ſet out in the ſtately ſhewes of his common plaies, to ſee if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide ſuch parts to be plaid, and a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on the other ſide, incoraging one an other, ſhewed themſelues ſtraight a great number gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of handes: inſomuch as the teares ranne downe many of their cheekes for very ioy, when they ſaw the images of Marius, & they extolled Cæſar to the skies, iudging him the worthieſt man of all the kinred of Marius. The Senate being aſſembled thereupon, Catulus Luctatius one of the greateſt authoritie at that time in Rome, roſe, & vehemently inueighed againſt Cæſar, and ſpake that then which euer ſince hath bene noted much: that Cæſar did not now courtly go to worke, but by plaine force ſought to alter the ſtate of the commonwealth. Neuertheleſſe, Cæſar at that time anſwered him ſo that the Senate was ſatisfied. Thereupon they that had him in eſtimation did grow in better hope than before, and perſwaded him, that hardily he ſhould giue place to no man, & that through the good will of the people, he ſhould be better than all they, and come to be the chiefeſt man of the citie. At that time, the chiefe Biſhoppe Metellus died, and two of the notableſt men of the citie, and of greateſt authoritie (Iſauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome. Cæſar notwithſtanding their contention, would giue neither of them both place, but preſented himſelfe to the people, and made ſute for it as they did. The ſute being equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, becauſe he was a man of greater calling and dignitie than the other, doubting the vncertaintie of the election: offered vnto Cæſar a good ſumme of money, to make him leaue off his ſuite. But Cæſar ſent him word againe, that he would lend a greater ſumme then that, to maintaine the ſute againſt him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the dore of his houſe, Cæſar weeping, kiſſed her, and ſaide: Mother, this day thou ſhalt ſee thy ſonne chiefe Biſhoppe of Rome, or baniſhed from Rome. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the ſtrife well debated: Cæſar wanne the victorie, and made the Senate and noble men all affraide of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piſo fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cæſar, when he knew that he was of conſpiracie with Catiline, and had opportunitie to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the ſtate of the common wealth, but vtterly to deſtroy the Empire of Rome, he ſcaped out of the handes of iuſtice for lacke of ſufficient proofe, before his full treaſon and deteſtation was knowen. Notwithſtanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the citie, companions of his conſpiracie: vnto whom, whether Cæſar did giue any ſecret helpe or comfort, it was not well knowen. Yet this is manifeſt, that when they were conuinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Conſul, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what puniſhment they ſhould haue, and euery one of them till it came to Cæſar, gaue ſentence they ſhould die: Cæſar ſtanding vp to ſpeake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and ſaide, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their cuſtome did beare it, to put men of ſuch nobilitie to death (but in an extremitie) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that they were put in priſon in ſome citie of Italy, where Cicero thought beſt, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowen: the Senate then might at their pleaſure quietly take ſuch order therein as might beſt appeare vnto their wiſedomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and the ſpeach was vttered with ſuch a paſſing good grace and eloquence, that not onely they which came to ſpeake after him did approue it: but ſuch alſo as had ſpoken to the contrarie before, changed their opinion and ſtuck to his, vntill it came to Cato & Catulus to ſpeake. They both ſpake ſharply inueigh againſt him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæſar ſuſpected to be of the conſpiracie, and ſtoutly ſpake againſt him, inſomuch that the offenders were put into the hands of the officers to be put to death. Cæſar comming out of the Senate, a company of young men which guarded Cicero for the safetie of his person, did set vppon him with their swordes drawen. But some say, that Curio couered Cæsar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their handes. And Cicero selfe, when the young men looked vpon him, beckened with his head that they should not kill him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a part. But if that were true, I maruell why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Consulshippe. But certainly they blamed him afterwardes, for that he tooke not the oportunitie offered him against Cæsar, onely for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him very dearely. For shortly after, when Cæsar went into the Senate, to cleere himselfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations obiected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer than they were wont: the people came about the councell house, and called out aloude for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the insurrection of the poore needie persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæsar, and did also moue the people to sturre: did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribution did put the common wealth to a new charge of fiue hundred and fifty Myriades. This counsell quenched a present great feare, and did in happie time scatter and disperse abroade the best part of Cæsars force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer sought any alteration in the common wealth, but contrarily he himselfe had a great misfortune fell in his owne house, which was this. There was a yong noble mā of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in ROME. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæsars wife, who misliked not withall: notwithstanding she was so straightly looked to, and that Aurelia (Cæsars mother) an honest gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill & difficultie. The ROMAINES do vse to honor a goddesse which they call the good goddesse, as the GRECIANS haue her whom they call Gynæcia, to wit, the goddesse of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS do claime to be peculiar vnto them, saying that she is king Midas mother. Howbeit the ROMAINES hold opinion, that it is a nimph of wood maried vnto god Faunus. The GRECIANS, they say also, that she was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feast day, the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, and leaues of vine branches, and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy dragon for this goddesse, and doe set it by her: besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say that the women in these sacrifices doe many things amongst themselues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast time, the husband, (whether he were Prætor or Consull) and all his men and the boyes in the house, doe come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, & there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they doe besides passe the night away in songes and musicke. Pompeia Cæsars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feast, Clodius who had yet no haire on his face, & therby thought he should not be bewrayed disguised himselfe in a singing wenches apparell, because his face was very like vnto a young wench. He finding the gates open, being secretly brought in by her chamber maide that was made priuie vnto it: she left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistresse, to tell her that he was come. The chamber maide taried long before shee came againe, insomuch as Clodius being wearie waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to an other in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the light, and was by chance met withall by one of Aureliaes maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeiaes women. So, Aureliaes maide knowing him by his voyce, ranne straight where the lightes and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women therewith were so amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leaue off the ceremonies of the sacrifice, and to hide their secret things, and hauing seene the gates fast locked, went immediatly vp and downe the

the house with torch light to seeke out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeias maide, with whom he hid him selfe. Thus Clodius being found out, and knowen of the women: they thrust him out of the dores by the shoulders. The same night the women tolde their husbandes of this chaunce as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumor through the city, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deserued, not onely to be punished of them whom he had slandered, but also of the common wealth and the goddes. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the nobility and Senato, that came to depose against him, and burdened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding, the people stoutly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Iudges, which were amazed, and afraid to offend the people. This notwithstanding, Cæsar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witnes against him, he answered, hee knew nothing of that they obiected against Clodius. This aunswere being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Cæsar, why then he had put away his wife: because I will (quoth he) that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cæsar spake truely as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, because the most part of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the feare they stoode one way of the daunger of the common people if they condemned him: and for the ill opinion of the other side of the nobility, if they did quit him. The gouernment of the prouince of SPAINE being fallen vnto Cæsar for that he was Prætor: his creditors came and cried out vpon him, and were importune of him to be payed. Cæsar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to goe vnto Crassus, who was the richest man of all ROME, and that stoode in needs of Cæsars boldnes and courage to withstand Pompeys greatnes in the common wealth. Crassus became his surety vnto his greatest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talentes: whereuppon they suffered Cæsar to depart to the gouernment of his prouince. In his iourney it is reported, that passing ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many housholdes, and yet poore cotages. There, his friendes that did accompany him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there were any strife there amongest the noble men for honor. Cæsar speaking in good earnest, aunswered, I can not tell that said he, but for my part, I had rather be the chiefest man here, then the second person in ROME. An other time also when he was in SPAINE, reading the history of Alexanders acts, when he had red it, he was sorrowful a good while after, and then burst out in weeping. His friends seeing that, maruelled what should be the cause of his sorrow. He aunswered them, doe ye not thinke sayd hee, that I haue good cause to be heauy, when king Alexander being no older then my selfe is now, had in old time wonne so many nations and countries: and that I hitherto vnto haue done nothing worthy of my selfe? Therefore when hee was come into SPAINE, he was very carefull of his busines, and had in few dayes ioyned tenne mo ensignes more of footemen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward against the CALLÆCIANS and LVSITANIANS, he conquered all, and went as far as the great sea Oceanum, subduing all the people which before knew not the ROMAINES for their Lordes. There he tooke order for pacifying of the war, and did as wisely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them friendes one with an other, but specially hee pacified all sutes of law, and strife, betwixt the debtors and creditors, which grew by reason of vsury. For he ordained that the creditors should take yearely two parts of the reuenue of their debtors, vntill such time as they had payed them selues: and that the debtors should haue the third part to them selues to liue with all. He hauing wonne great estimation by this good order taken, returned from his gouernment very rich, and his souldiers also full of rich spoiles, who called him Imperator, to say soueraine Captaine. Now the ROMAINS hauing a custome, that such as demaunded honor of triumphe, should remaine awhile without the city, & that they on the other side which sued for the Consulship, should of necessity be there in person: Cæsar comming vnhappily at that very time when the Consuls were chosen, he sent to pray the Senate to do him that fauor, that being absent, hee might by his friends sue for the Consulshippe. Cato at the first did vehemently inuey against it, vouching an expresse law forbidding the contrary. But afterwardes, perceiuing that notwithstanding the reasons he alleaged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæsar) fauoured his request: yet he cunningly sought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, dilating oration vntill night. Cæsar thereupon determined rather to giue ouer the sute of his triumph and to make sute for the Consulshippe: and so came into the city, and had such a deuise with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato onely. His deuise was this, Pompey and Crassus, two of the greatest personages of the city of ROME, being at iarre together, Cæsar made them friends and by that meanes got vnto him selfe the power of them both: for, by colour of that great acte and friendshippe of his, he subtilly (vnwares to them all) did greatly alter and change the state of the common wealth. For it was not the priuate discord betweene Pompey and Cæsar, as many men thought, that caused the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers first to ouerthrow the state of the Senate and nobility, and afterwardes they fell at iarre one with an other. But Cato, that then foresaw and prophecied many times what would followe, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwardes they found him a wiser man, then happy in his counsell. Thus Cæsar being brought vnto the assembly of the election, in the middest of these two noble persons, whom hee had before reconciled together: he was there chosen Consull, with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gainsaying or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he beganne to put foorth lawes meeter for a seditious Tribune of the people, then for a Consull: because by them he preferred the deuision of landes, and distributing of corne to euery citizen, Cæsar to please them withall. But when the noble men of the Senate were against his deuise, he desiring no better occasion, began to crie out, and to protest, that by the ouerhardnesse and austerity of the Senate, they draue him against his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Crassus on the one side of him, and Pompey on the other, he asked them openly in the assembly, if they did giue their consent vnto the lawes which he had put forth. They both answered, they did. Then he prayed them to stand by him against those that threatned him with force of sword to let him. Crassus gaue him his word, he would. Pompey also did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his sword and target both, against them that would withstand him with their swordes. These words offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauity, and vndecent for the maiesty and honour he caried, and most of all vncomely for the presence of the Senate whom he should haue reuerenced: and were speaches fitter for a rash light headed youth, then for his person. Howbeit the common people on the other side, they reioyced. Then Cæsar because he would be more assured of Pompeys power and friendship, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made sure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, and promised him in exchange Pompeis wife, the which was sure also vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla. And shortly after also, Cæsar selfe did marie Calphurnia, the daughter of Piso, whom he caused to be made Consull, to succeede him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnes, that it was a shamefull matter, and not to be suffered, that they should in that sort make hauoke of the Empire of ROME, by such horrible bawdie matches, distributing among them selues through these wicked mariages, the gouernments of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calphurnius Bibulus fellow Consull with Cæsar, perceiuing that he did contend in vaine, making all the resistance he could to withstand this law, and that oftentimes hee was in daunger to be slaine with Cato in the market place and assembly: hee kept close in his house all the rest of his Consulshippe. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with souldiers, & by open force authorised the lawes which Cæsar made in the behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Cæsar had GAVLE on this side, and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with foure legions graunted him for fiue yeares. Then Cato standing vp to speake against it: Cæsar badde his officers lay holde on him, and carie him to prison, thinking hee would haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato sayd neuer a word, when he went his way. Cæsar perceiuing then, that not not onely the Senators and nobility were offended, but that the common people also for the reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were ashamed, and went away with silence: he him selfe secretely did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be President of the Senate vnder him, but left the city, because they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Considius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to councell, because they were afrayed of his souldiers. Cæsar answered him againe: and why then, doest not thou keepe thee at home, for the same feare? Considius replied, because my age taketh away fear from me: for hauing so short a time to liue, I haue no care to prolong it further. The shamefullest part that Cæsar played while he was Consull, seemeth to be this: when he chose Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offred his wife such dishonor, and profaned the holy ancient mysteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne house. Clodius sued to be Tribune to no other end, but to destroy Cicero: and Cæsar selfe also departed not from Rome to his army, before he had set them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of Italy. All these things they say he did, before the warres with the Gaules. But the time of the great armies and conquests he made afterwards, and of the war in the which he subdued al the Gaules: (entring into an other course of life far contrary vnto the first) made him to be known for as valiant a souldier and as excellent a Captaine to lead men, as those that afore him had been counted the wisest and most valiantest Generals that euer were, and that by their valiant deedes had atchieued great honor. For whosoeuer would compare the house of the Fabians, of the Scipios, of the Metellians, yea those also of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey selfe, Cæsar by Clodius, draue Cicero out of Italy.

Cæsar, a valiant souldier, and a skilfull captaine.

It will appeare that Cæsars prowes and deedes of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard countries where he made wars: an other, in enlarging the realmes and countries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of Rome: an other, in the multitude and power of his enemies whom he ouercame: an other, in the rudenesse and austere nature of men with whom he had to doe, whose maners afterwardes he softned and made ciuill: an other, in curtesie and clemency which he vsed vnto them whome hee had conquered: an other in great bounty and liberality bestowed vpon them that serued vnder him in those warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had slaine in battell. For in lesse then tenne yeares warre in Gaule hee tooke by force and assault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred seuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirty hundred thousand souldiers, at sundry times hee slue tenne hundred thousand of them, and tooke as many more prisoners. Furthermore, he was so entirely beloued of his souldiers, that to doe him seruice (where otherwise they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Cæsars honour were touched, they were inuincible, and would so desperatly venture them selues, & with such fury, that no mã was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Acilius: who in a battell by sea before the city of Marselles, bording one of his enemies ships, one cut off his right hand with a sword, but yet he forsooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his enemies faces, and made them flie, so that he wan their ship from them. And Cassius Scæua also, in a conflict before the city of Dyrrachium, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his shoulder striken through with a dart, and his thigh with an other, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his shield: he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeelde vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their shoulders from his body with his sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, and at the length saued him selfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in Britayne also, when the Captaines of the bandes were driuen into a marrisse or bogge full of mire and durt, and that the enemies did fiercely assaile them there: Cæsar then standing to view the battell, hee saw a priuate souldier of his thrust in among the Captaines, and fought so valiantly in their defence, that at the length hee draue the barbarous people to flie, and by his meanes saued the Captaines, which otherwise were in great daunger to haue bene cast away.

The loue and respect of Cæsars souldiers vnto him.

The wonderful valiantnes of Acilius, Cassius Scæua, and diuers others of Cæsars souldiers.

Then this ſouldier being the hindemoſt man of all the Captaines, marching with great pain through the mire and durt, halfe ſwimming, and halfe a foote in the end got to the other ſide, but left his ſhield behinde him. Cæſar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with ioy to imbrace him. But the poore ſouldier hanging downe his head, the water ſtanding in his eyes, fell downe at Cæſars feete, and beſought him to pardon him, for that he had left his target behinde him. And in Affrike alſo, Scipio hauing taken one of Cæſars ſhippes, and ſlaine Granius Petronius. as Petronius aboord on her amongeſt other, not long before choſen Treaſurer: he put all the reſt to the ſword but him, and ſayed he would giue him his life. But Petronius anſwered him againe: that Cæſars ſouldiers did not vſe to haue their liues giuen them, but to giue other their liues: and with thoſe wordes he drew his ſword, and thruſt him ſelfe through. Now Cæſars ſelfe did breede this noble courage and life in them. Firſt, for that he gaue them bountifully, and did honor them alſo, ſhewing thereby, that he did not heape vp riches in the way to maintaine his life afterwardes in wantonneſſe and pleaſure, but that he did keepe it in ſtore honourably to reward their valiant ſeruice: and that by ſo much hee thought him ſelfe richer by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deſerued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder ſo much at his valiantneſſe in putting him ſelfe at euery inſtant in ſuch manifeſt daunger, and in taking ſo extreame paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy deſire of honor that ſet him a fire, and pricked him forward to doe it: but that hee alwaies continued all labour and hardineſſe, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the conſtitution of his body, hee was leane, white, and ſoft ſkinned, and often ſubiect to headache, and otherwhile to the falling ſickneſs: (the which tooke him the firſt time, as it is reported, in Cordvba, a city of Spaine) but yet therefore yeelded not to the diſeaſe of his body, to make it a cloke to cherriſhe him withall, but contrarily tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his ſicke body fighting alwayes with his diſeaſe, trauelling continually, liuing ſoberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the moſt nights he ſlept in his coch or litter, and thereby beſtowed his reſt, to make him alwayes able to doe ſome thing: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the country to the townes, caſtels, and ſtrong places. He had alwaies a ſecretarie with him in his coche, who did ſtill write as he went by the way, and a ſouldier behinde him that caried his ſword. He made ſuch ſpeede the firſt time he came from Rome, when he had his office: that in eight daies he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was ſo excellent a rider of horſe from his youth, that holding his handes behinde him, he would galloppe his horſe vppon the ſpurre. In his warres in Gavle, he did further exerciſe him ſelfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupy two ſecretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. And it is reported, that Cæſar was the firſt that deuiſed friendes might talke together by writing ciphers in letters, when he had no leyſure to ſpeake with them for his weighty buſineſſe, and for the great diſtance beſides from Rome. How litle accompt Cæſar made of his diet, this example doth proue it. Cæſar ſupping one night in Milane with his friend Valerius Leo, there was ſerued ſparrage to his bourde, and oyle of perfume put into it inſtead of ſallet oyle. He ſimply eate it, and found no fault, blaming his friendes that were offended and told them, that it had bene enough for them to haue abſtained to eate of that they miſliked, and not to ſhame their friend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with his friend. An other time as he trauelled through the country, he was driuen by fowle weather on the ſodaine to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was ſo narrow, that one man could but ſcarce lye in it. Then he ſayed to his friendes that were about him: greateſt roomes are meeteſt for ſot greateſt men, and the moſt neceſſary roomes for the ſickeſt perſons. And thereuppon he cauſed Oppius that was ſicke to lie there all night: and he him ſelfe, with the reſt of his friends, lay with out dores, vnder the eaſing of the houſe. The firſt warre that Cæſar made with the Gavles, was with the Helvetians and Tigvrnians, who hauing ſette fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and foure hundred villages beſides, came to inuade that part of Gavle which was ſubiect to the Romaines, as the Cimbri and Tevtons had done before: vnto whom for valiantneſſe they gaue no place, and they were alſo a great number of them (for they were thre hundred thousoules in all) whereof there were a hundred, foure score, and tenne thousand fighting men. Of those, it was not Cæsar himselfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenaunt, that ouerthrew them by the riuer of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themselues came sodainely with their army to set vpon him, as he was going towardes a city of his confederates. Cæsar perceiuing that, made haste to get him some place of strength, and there to sette his men in battell ray. When one brought him his horse to gette vp on which he should fight in battell, he sayed vnto them: when I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to follow the chase, but now lette vs giue them charge. Therewith he marched forward a foote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before hee could make them flie that were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their cartes. For there, they that before had fledde from the battell, did not onely put them selues in force, and valiantly fought out: but their wiues and children also fighting for their liues to the death, were all slaine, and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this victory was famous, vnto that he also added an other as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, hee gathered together againe aboue a hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their country which they had forsaken, and into their townes also which they had burnt: because he feared the GERMAINES would come ouer the riuer of Rheyne, and occupie that countrey lying voide. The second warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he him selfe had caused Ariouistus their king, to be receiued for a confederat of the ROMAINS. Notwithstanding, they were growen very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainely, that hauing any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they woulde not content them with their owne, but ment to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Cæsar perceiuing that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young gentlemen of noble houses of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as only for their pleasure and game: he called them to councell, and commaunded them that were afrayd, that they should get home, and not put them selues in daunger against their willes, sith they had such womanish faint hearts to shrinke when he had neede of them. And for him selfe, he sayed, hee would set vppon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, saying, that the enemies were no valianter then the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferior vnto Marius. This oration being made, the souldiers of the tenth legion sent their Lieutenaunts vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iourney with good will to serue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlongs of the campe of the enemies. Arioustus courage was well cooled, when he saw Cæsar was come, and that the ROMAINES came to seeke out the GERMAINES, where they thought, and made accompt, that they durst not haue abidden them: and therefore nothing mistrusting it would haue come so to passe, hee wondered much at Cæsars courage, and the more when he saw his owne army in a maze withall. But much more did their courages fall, by reason of the foolishe women propheciers they had among them, which did foretell things to come: who, considering the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noise they made running downe the streame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the new moone. Cæsar hauing intelligence thereof, and perceiuing that the barbarous people thereuppon ceased not: thought it best then to sette vppon them, being discouraged with this superstitious feare, rather then loosing time, hee should tarie their leysure. So he did skirmishe with them euen to their fortes, and litle hilles where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them so, that with great furie they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlong, euen vnto the riuer of Rheyn: and hee filled all the fieldes thitherto with dead bodies and spoyles. Howbeit Arioustus flying with speede, gotte ouer the riuer of Rheyn, and escaped with a few of his men. It is sayed that there were slaine foure score thousand persons at this battell. After this exploite, Cæsar left his army amongest the SEQVANES to winter there:

to see him: vnto whom he graunted their sutes they demaunded, and sent them home partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promises and hope. Now during all men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third part of GAVLE) were all vp in arm and had raised a great power of men together: he straight made towardes them with all sible speede, and found them spoyling and ouerrunning the countrey of the GAVLES, th neighbours, and confederates of the ROMAINES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighti cowardly, he ouerthrew the most part of them which were in a troupe together, and slue a number of them, that the ROMAINES passed ouer deepe riuers and lakes a foote, vpon dead bodies, the riuers were so full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt neares to the sea side, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld them selues without compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his army against the NERVIANS, the stoutest war ers of all the BELGÆ. They dwelling in the wodde countrey, had conuayed their wiues, ch dren and goods, into a maruellous great forrest, as farre from their enemies as they could:

being about the number of six score thousand fighting men and more, they came one day compassing in the twelfth and seauenth legion, they slue all the Centurions and Captaines the bands. And had not Cæsar selfe taken his shield on his arme, and flying in amongst the barous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth legion also ing him in danger, run vnto him from the toppe of the hill where they stoode in battell, broken the ranckes of their enemies: there had not a ROMAINE escaped a liue that day. taking example of Cæsars valiantnes, they fought desperately beyond their power, and could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all maner slaine in the field. It is written that of three score thousand fighting men, there escape only but fiue hundred: and of foure hundred gentlemen and counsellers of the ROMAINS, three saued. The Senate vnderstanding it at ROME, ordained that they should do sacrifice to the goddes, and keepe feasts and solemne processions fifteene dayes together without inter mission, hauing neuer made the like ordinaunce at ROME, for any victory that euer was ob tained. Because they saw the danger had bene maruellous great, so many nations rising as th did in armes together against him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his v ctory much more famous. For when Cæsar had set his affairs at a stay in GAVLE, on the ot side of the Alpes: he alwayes vsed to lye about the riuer of Po in the winter time, to giue d ction for the establishing of things at ROME, at his pleasure. For, not onely they that m sute for offices at ROME were chosen Magistrates, by means of Cæsars money which he g them, with the which, bribing the people, they bought their voices, and when they were office, did al that they could to increase Cæsars power and greatnes: but the greatest and chie men also of the nobility, went vnto LVKE vnto him. As Pompey, Crassus, Appius, Prætor SARDINIA, and Nepos, Proconsull in SPAINE. Insomuch that there were at one time, six scor sergeaunts carying roddes and axes before the Magistrats: and aboue two hundred Senato besides. There they fell in consultation, and determined that Pompey and Crassus should agai be chosen Consuls the next yeare following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Cæsar sho haue money againe deliuered him to pay his army, and besides, did proroge the time of h gouernment fiue yeares further. This was thought a very strange and an vnreasonable matt vnto wise men. For they thē selues that had taken so much money of Cæsar, perswaded the Se nate to let him haue money of the common treasure, as though he had had none before: yea t speake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, sighing & lamenting to see the decre

they passed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposly sent him before into CYPRVS. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes steppes, when he saw that he could not preuaile, nor withstand them: he went out of the Senate in choller, and cried out amongest the people, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him: some for the reuerence they bare vnto Pompey, and Crassus, and others fauouring Cæsars proceedings, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet themselues, and sturred not. Then Cæsar returning into GAVLE beyond the Alpes vnto his armie, founde there a great warre in the country. For two great nations of GERMANIE had not long before passed ouer the riuer of Rheyn, to conquer new landes: and the one of these people were called IPES, and the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the battell which Cæsar fought with them, he himselfe doth describe in his Commentaries, in this sort. That the barbarous people hauing sent Ambassadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time, they notwithstanding, against law of armes, came and set vpon him as he trauelled by the way, in somuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrew fiue thousand of his horsemen, who nothing at all mistrusted their comming. Againe, that they sent him other Ambassadours to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole armie to marche against them, thinking it a follie, and madnesse, to keepe faith with such traiterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Cauutius writeth, that the Senate appointing againe to do new sacrifice, processions, and feastes, to giue thankes to the goddes for this victorie: Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the handes of the barbarous people, for to purge their citie and common wealth of this breache of faith, and to turne the curse vpon him, that was the authour of it. Of these barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thousand persons) they were all in manner slaine, sauing a very few of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the riuer of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the SICAMBRIANS, an other people of the GERMAINES. Cæsar taking this occasion against them, lacking no good will of himselfe besides, to haue the honour to be counted the first ROMAINE that euer passed ouer the riuer of Rheyn with an army: he built a bridge ouer it. This riuer is maruellous broad, and runneth with great furie. And in that place specially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breath from one side to the other, and it hath so strong and swift a streame besides: that men casting downe great bodies of trees into the riuer (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force thereof maruellously shake the postes of the bridge he had set vp. But to preuent the blowes of those trees, and also to breake the furie of the streame: he made a pile of great wood aboue the bridge a good way, and did forcibly ramme them in to the bottome of the riuer, so that in ten dayes space, he had set vp and finisht his bridge of the goodliest carpenters worke, and most excellent inuention to see to, that could be possible thought or deuised. Then passing ouer his armie vpon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the SVVEVIANS, which were the warlikest people of all GERMANIE, had gotten themselues with their goodes into wonderfull great valleys and bogges, full of woods and forrests. Now when he had burnt all the coūtry of his enemies, & confirmed the league with the confederats of the ROMAINES: he returned backe againe into GAVLE after he had taried eighteen dayes at the most in GERMANIE, on the other side of the Rheyn. The iourney he made also into ENGLAND was a noble enterprise, & very commendable. For he was the first that sailed the West Ocean with an army by sea, & that passed through the sea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that so great & famous Iland: (which many auncient writers would not beleeue that it was so indeede, & did make them vary about it, saying that it was but a fable & a lye) and was the first that enlarged the ROMAINE Empire, beyond the earth inhabitable. For twise he passed ouer the narrow sea against the firme land of GAVLE, and fighting many battels there, did hurt his enemies more, then enrich his owne men: because, of men hardly brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon his warre had not such successe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the king, and imposing a yearely tribute vpon him, to be payed vnto the people of ROME: he returned againe into GAVLE. Where he was no sooner landed, but he founde letters ready to be sent ouer the sea vnto him:

Ipes, and Tenterides, people of Germanie.

The death of Iulia Cæsars daughter.

in the which he was aduertiſed from ROME, of the death of his daughter, that ſhe was dead with child by Pōpey. For the which, Pompey & Cæſar both, were maruellous forowfull: & their friends mourned alſo, thinking that this alliance which mainteined the common wealth (that otherwiſe was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now ſeuered, and broken a ſunder, and the rather likely, becauſe the child liued not long after the mother. So the common people at ROME tooke the corps of Iulia, in deſpight of the Tribunes, & buried it in the field of Mars. Now Cæſar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) into ſundry garriſons for the winter time, and returning againe into ITALIE as he was wont: all GAVLE rebelled againe, and had raiſed great armies in euery quarter to ſet vpon the ROMAINES, and to aſſay if they could diſtreſſe their forts where they lay in garriſon. The greateſt number & moſt warlike men of theſe GAVLES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and firſt did ſet vpon the garriſons of Cotta, and Titurius, whom they ſlue, & all the ſouldiers they had about them. Then they went with three ſcore thouſand fighting men to beſiege the garriſon which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almoſt taken them by force, becauſe all the ſouldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were ſo valiant & couragious, that they did more then men (as they ſay) in defending of themſelues. Theſe newes being come to Cæſar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all poſsible ſpeede, and leuying ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers, made haſt to helpe Cicero that was in ſuch diſtreſſe. The GAVLES that did beſiege Cicero, vnderſtanding of Cæſars comming, raiſed their ſiege incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handfull in their handes, they were ſo few. Cæſar to deceiue them, ſtill drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wiſe to ſturre out to skirmiſh with them, but compelled them to raiſe vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afrayd, becauſe the enemies ſhould the leſſe eſteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke opportunitie, by their diſorderly cōming to aſſaile the trenches of his campe, (they were growen to ſuch a preſumptuous boldneſſe and brauery) and then ſalying out vpon them, he put them all to flight with ſlaughter of a great number of them. This did ſuppreſſe all the rebellions of the GAVLES in thoſe parties, and furthermore, he himſelfe in perſon went in the middeſt of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new ſupply out of ITALIE of three whole legions in their roome, which he had loſt: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion, he himſelfe had leauyed in GAVLE about the riuer of Po. During theſe ſturres, brake forth the beginning of the greateſt & moſt daungerous warre that he had in all GAVLE, the which had bene ſecretly practiſed of long time by the chiefeſt & moſt warlike people of that country, who had leauied a wonderfull great power. For euery where they leauied multitudes of men, and great riches beſides, to fortifie their ſtrong holds.

Furthermore the countrey where they roſe, was very ill to come vnto, & ſpecially at that time being winter, when the riuers were froſen, the woodes and forreſts couered with ſnow, the medowes drowned with fluddes, and the fieldes ſo deepe of ſnow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the mariſſes nor riuers to be diſcerned, all was ſo ouerflowen & drowned with water: all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Cæſar from ſetting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the GAVLES were of this conſpiracy, but two of the chiefeſt were the ARVERNIANS and CARNVTES: who had choſen Vercingentorix for their Lieutenant generall, whoſe father the GAVLES before had put to death, becauſe they thought he aſpired to make himſelfe king. This Vercingentorix deuiding his armie into diuers partes, and appointing diuers Captaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and countries there about, euen as far as they that dwell towards the ſea* Adriatick, hauing further determined (vnderſtāding that ROME did cōſpire againſt Cæſar) to make all GAVLE riſe in armes againſt him. So that if he had but taried a litle longer, vntill Cæſar had entred into his ciuill warres: he had put all ITALIE in as great feare and daunger, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and inuade it. But Cæſar, that was valiant in all aſſayes and daungers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and oportunitie: ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the newes of the rebellion, he departed with ſpeede, and returned backe the ſelfe ſame way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they should deale with an army vnuincible, & which they could not possibly withstand, considering the great speede he had made with the same, in so sharpe and hard a winter. For where they would not possibly haue beleeued, that a post or currer could haue come in so short a time from the place where he was, vnto them: they wondred when they saw him burning & destroying the countrey, the townes & strong forts where he came with his army, taking all to mercy that yeelded vnto him: vntill such time as the HEDVI tooke armes against him, who before were wont to be called the brethrē of the ROMAINES, & were greatly honored of them. Wherfore Cæsars men whē they vnderstood that they had ioyned with the rebels, they were maruellous sory, and halfe discouraged. Therupon, Cæsar departing from those parties, went through the coūtry of the LINGONES, to enter the coūtry of the *BVRGONIANS, who were confederats of the ROMAINES, & the neareſt vnto ITALY on that side, in respect of all the rest of GAVLE. Thither the enemies came to set vpon him, and to enuironne him of all sides, with an infinit number of thousands of fighting mē. Cæsar on the other side taried their comming, & fighting with them a long time, he made them so affrayd of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the first, it seemeth notwithstanding, that he had receiued some ouerthrow: for the ARVERNIANS shewed a sword hanged vp in one of their temples, which they sayd they had wonne from Cæsar. Insomuch as Cæsar selfe comming that away by occasion, saw it, and fell a laughing at it. But some of his friendes going about to take it away, he would not suffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was a holy thing. Notwithstanding, such as at the first had saued themselues by flying, the most of them were gotten with their king into the citie of ALEXIA, the which Cæsar went and besieged, although it seemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as also for the multitude of souldiers they had to defend it. But now during this siege, he fell into a maruellous great daunger without, almost incredible. For an army of three hundred thousand fighting men of the best men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came against him, being at the siege of ALEXIA, besides them that were within the citie, which amounted to the number of three score and ten thousand fighting men at the least: so that perceiuing he was shut in betwixt two so great armies, he was driuen to fortifie himselfe with two wals, the one against them of the citie, and the other against them without. For if those two armies had ioyned together, Cæsar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this siege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wanne before it, did deseruedly winne him more honour and fame, then any other. For there, in that instant and extreme daunger, he shewed more valiantnesse & wisedome, then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wōderfull thing was this? that they of the citie neuer heard any thing of them that came to ayde them, vntill Cæsar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMAINES themselues which kept watch vpon the wall that was built against the citie, knew also no more of it, then they, but when it was done, & that they heard the cryes & lamentations of men & women in ALEXIA, when they perceiued on the other side of the citie such a nūber of glistering shields of gold and siluer, such store of bloudy corslets and armours, such a deale of plate and moueables, and such a number of tents and pauilions after the fashion of the GAVLES, which the ROMAINES had gotten of their spoyles in their campe. Thus sodainly was this great army vanished, as a dreame or vision: where the most part of them were slaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the citie of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cæsar, and themselues also: in the end, they all yeelded themselues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Captaine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horse furnished with rich cappariſon accordingly, and rode round about Cæsar, who sate in his chaire of estate. Then lighting from his horse, he tooke off his cappariſon and furniture, and vnarmed himselfe, and layed all on the ground, and went and sate downe at Cæsars feete, and sayd neuer a word. So Cæsar at length committed him as a prisoner taken in the warres, to lead him afterwardes in his triumph at ROME. Now Cæsar had of long time determined to destroy Pompey, & Pompey him also. For Crassius being killed amōgst the PARTHIANS, who onely did see, that one of them two must needes fall: nothing kept Cæsar from being the greateſt person, but because he destroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pōpey to withstand that it should not come to passe, but because he did not first ouercome Cæsar, whom only he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before set light by him, thinking it an easie matter for him to put him downe when he would, sith he had brought him to that greatnes he was come vnto. But Cæsar contrarily, hauing had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wrestler that studieth for trickes to ouerthrow his aduersary: he went farre from ROME, to exercise himselfe in the warres of GAVLE, where he did trayne his armie, and presently by his valiant deedes did increase his fame and honour. By these meanes became Cæsar as famous as Pompey in his doings, & lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution, but some occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gaue him, & partly also the time deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernement at that time of the common wealth at ROME. For they that made sute for honour & offices, bought the voyces of the people with ready money, which they gaue out openly to vsury, without shame or feare. Therupõ, the common people that had sold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hyred them: not with their voyces, but with their bowes, slings, and swords. So that the assembly seldome time brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and sprinckled with the bloud of them that were slaine in the market place, the citie remaining all that time without gouernement of Magistrate, like a ship left without a Pilote. In somuch, as men of deepe iudgement & discretion seeing such furie and madnesse of the people, thought themselues happy if the cõmon wealth were no worse troubled, then with the absolute state of a Monarchy & soueraign Lord to gouerne thẽ. Furthermore, there were many that were not affrayed to speake it openly, that there was no other helpe to remedy the troubles of the cõmon wealth, but by the authority of one man only, that should cõmand them all: and that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Phisition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vsed many fine speaches, making semblãce as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnder hand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the marke he shot at, & fearing least in the end the people should be compelled to make him Dictator: he perswaded the Senat rather to make him sole Consull, that contẽting himself with that more iust & lawfull gouernmẽt, he should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not only make him Consull, but further did proroge his gouernemẽt of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all SPAYNE, & AFRICK, the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: & further, he receiued yearely of the common treasure to pay his souldiers a thousand talents.

Hereupon Cæsar tooke occasion also to send his men to make sute in his name for the Consulship, & also to haue the gouernement of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Cæsar) withstood them, and to shame & dishonour him, had much needelesse speach in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the freedome frõ the COLONYES which Cæsar had lately brought vnto the city of NOVVM COMVM in GAVLE towards ITALY, where Cæsar not lõg before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Consull, he made one of the Senators in that citie to be whipped with rods, who came to ROME about those matters: and sayd, he gaue him those marks that he should know he was no ROMAINE Citizen, & bad him go his way, & tell Cæsar of it.

Cæsar bribeth the Magistrats at Rome.

After Marcellus Consulship, Cæsar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotten among the GAVLES, did franckely giue it out amongst the Magistrates at ROME, without restraint or spare. First, he set Curio, the Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue also vnto Paule the Consull a thousand fiue hundred talents, with which money he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Basilicke, in the place of Fuluius Basilicke. Thẽ Pompey being affrayd of this practise, began openly to procure, both by himselfe and his friends, that they should send Cæsar a successour: & moreouer, he sent vnto Cæsar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of GAVLE. Cæsar sent him them againe, and gaue euery private souldier, two hundred and fifty siluer drachmas. Now, they that brought these two legions backe from Cæsar, gaue out ill and seditious wordes against him among the people, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruellously desired and wished for in Cæsars campe: and that though in ROME, for the mat-lice and secret spight which the gouernours there did beare him, he could hardly obteine that he desired: yet in GAVLE he might assure himselfe, that all the armie was at his commaundement. They added further also, that if the souldiers there did once returne ouer the mountaines again into ITALIE, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cæsar: because he wearied them with too much labour & continuall fight, and withall, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding securitie in Pompey, & a vaine conceit of himself, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation for warre, as though he had no occasion to be afrayed: but onely studied to thwart Cæsar in speach, & to crosse the sutes he made. Howbeit Cæsar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cæsars Captaines which was sent to ROME to prosecute his sute, being at the Senate doore, & hearing that they denied to prorogue Cæsars time of gouernement which he sued for: clapping his hand vpon his sword, he said, sith you will not grant it him, this shall giue it him. Notwithstãding, the requests that Cæsar propounded, caried great semblance of reason with them. For he sayd, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: & that both of them as priuat persons should come & make sute of their Citizens to obtaine honorable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, & graunting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make himselfe a tyrant, and in the meane time to graunt the other meanes to be a tyrant. Curio making these offers & perswasions openly before the people, in the name of Cæsar, he was heard with great reioycing and clapping of hands, & there were some that cast flowers and nosegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vse to do vnto any man, when he hath obteined victorie, and wonne any games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a letter sent frõ Cæsar, and made it openly to be read in despight of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæsar did not dismisse his army by a certaine day appointed him, the ROMAINES should proclaime him an enemy vnto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked in the presence of the Senatours, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismisse his armie: but few agreed to that demaund. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæsar should dismisse his armie: thereto they in manner aunswered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested againe that both of them should lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did insolently behaue himselfe, and Marcellus also, who cryed that they must vse force of armes, & not mens opinions against a theefe: the Senate rose straight vpon it without further determination, & men chaunged apparell through the citie because of this dissention, as they vse to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæsar, which seemed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would grant him GAVLE, that lyeth betweene the mountaines of the Alpes & ITALIE, & ILLYRIA, with two legios onely: & then that he would request nothing else, vntill he made sute for the secõd Cõsulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from his gouernement of CILICIA, trauelled to recõcile them together, & pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him, he would yeeld to any thing they would haue him, so he did let him alone with his army. So Cicero perswaded Cæsars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and fiue thousand men onely, that they might be friends & at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded vnto it, & granted them. But Lentulus the Consull would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themselues gaue Cæsar a happy occasion & colour, as could be, stirring vp his souldiers the more against them, whẽ he shewed them these two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, disguised like slaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driuen for feare to steale out of ROME, disguised in that maner. Now at that time, Cæsar had not about him, aboue fiue thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen: for the rest of his armie, he left on the other side of the mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So, considering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not need so many men at the first, but rather sodainly stealing vpon them, to make them afrayed with his vauntfe, taking benefit of the opportunitie of time, because he should more easily make his enemies afrayed of him, comming so sodainly when they looked not for him; then he should otherwise distresse them, assailing them with his whole armie, in giuing them leysure to pro-

uide further for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armour then their swords, to take the citie of ARIMINVM, (a great citie of GAVLE, being the first citie men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as litle bloudshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that force and army he had with him, vnto Hortensius one of his friends: he remained a whole day together, openly in the sight of euery man, to see the sword players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongest them, and made mery with them a while, whom he had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be mery, and no man to sturre, for he would straight come to them againe: howbeit he had secretly before commaunded a few of his trustiest friends to follow him, not altogether, but some one way, and some an other way. He himselfe in the meane time tooke a coche he had hyred, and made as though he would haue gone some other way at the first, but sodainly he turned backe againe towardes the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle riuer of Rubicon, which deuideth GAVLE on this side the Alpes from ITALIE: he stayed vpon a sodaine. For, the neater he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, to thinke what an enterprise he tooke in hand: & his thoughtes also fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into consideration of the desperatnesse of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himselfe, and spake neuer a word, waiuing sometime one way, sometime an other way, and oftentimes chaunged his determination, contrary to himselfe. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Asinius Pollio, telling them what mischiues the beginning of this passage ouer that riuer would breed in the world, and how much their posteritie and them that liued after them, would speake of it in time to come. But at length, casting from him with a noble courage, all those perillous thoughts to come, & speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt daungerous and desperat enterprises, A desperat man feareth no daunger, come on: he passed ouer the riuer, and when he was come ouer, he ranne with his coche and neuer stayed, so that before day light he was within the citie of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is said, that the night before he passed ouer the riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The citie of ARIMINVM being taken, & the rumour therof dispersed through all ITALIE, euen as if it had bene ope warre both by sea & land, & as if all the lawes of ROME, together with the extreme bounds and confines of the same had bene broken vp: a man would haue sayd, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities themselues letting their habitations, fled from one place to an other through all ITALIE. And ROME itself also was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parties like droues of cattell, that there was neither office nor Magistrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude: so that ROME had in manner destroyed it selfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, there were daungerous sturres and tumultes euery where: because they that were glad of the trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that seemed either to be afrayed or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himselfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill wordes some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproued him, and sayd that he had done wisely, and had payed for his folly, because he had made Cæsar so great and strong against him and the common weale. And other againe did blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Cæsar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consull to abuse his power too much. On the other side, Phaonius spake vnto him, & bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey being one day in a braueric in the Senate, sayd openly: let no man make any thought for preparation of warre, for when he listed, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALIE with souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time he greater number of souldiers then Cæsar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lyes, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Cæsar had bene already at their heeles, and had wonne all: so that in the end he yeelded vnto them, and gaue place to their furie and madnesse, determining (seeing all things in such tumult and garboyle) that there was no way but to forsake the citie, and thereupon commaunded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tary there, vnlesse he loued tyranny, more then his own libertie and the common wealth. Thus the Consuls themselues, before they had done their common sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the citie, fled euery man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senatours, taking their owne things in hast, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from an other. And there were some of them also that alwayes loued Cæsar, whose wits were then so troubled & besides themselues, with the feare they had conceiued: that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessitie. But aboue all things, it was a lamentable sight to see the citie it selfe, that in this feare & trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ship tossed in storme of sea, forsaken of her Pilots, and dispairing of her safetie. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to be their naturall countrey, and reckoned ROME no better then Cæsars campe. At that time also Labienus, who was one of Cæsars greatest friends, and had bene alwayes vsed as his Leutenant in the warres of GAVLE, and had valiantly fought in his cause: he likewise forsooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæsar sent his money and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the citie of CORFINIVM, the which Domitius kept, with thirty cohorts or ensignes. When Domitius saw he was besieged, he straight thought himselfe but vndone, and dispayring of his successe, he bad a Phisition, a slaue of his, giue him poyson. The Phisition gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemencie and wonderfull curtesie Cæsar vsed vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament & bewayle his desperate resolution taken to dye. The Phisition did comfort him againe, & told him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him sleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went straight and yeelded himselfe vnto Cæsar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stale away immediatly, & fled vnto Pompey. When these newes were brought to ROME, they did maruellously reioyce and comfort them that still remained there: and moreouer there were of them that had forsaken ROME, which returned thither againe. In the meane time, Cæsar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leuied men for Pompey. Now Cæsar hauing assembled a great & dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to finde Pompey himselfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of BRVNDVSIVM, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with their army he had, vnto DYRRACHIVM: and he himselfe also went thither afterwardes, when he vnderstood that Cæsar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cæsar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting ships to take the seas, he returned forthwith to ROME: So that in lesse then three score daies, he was Lord of all ITALIE, without any bloud-shed. Who when he was come to ROME, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senatours there also, he curteously intreated them, and prayed them to send vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them, vpon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either because they feared Pompey for that they had forsaken him, or else for that they thought Cæsar meant not as he spake, but that they were wordes of course, to colour his purpose withall. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but told him that it was against the law: Tush, sayd he, time & warre and law are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for warre can not abide this francke and bold speach. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of fauour, in payring so much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that haue risen against me, and whom I haue in my handes. When he had spoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple doore where the treasure lay: and finding no keyes there, he causèd Smithes to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon began againe to withstand him, and certaine men that stood by prayséd him in his doing: but Cæsar at length speaking biggely to him, threatned him he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, young man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly: and euer after that, Cæsar had all at his commaundement for the warres. From thence he went into SPAYNE, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: first to get their armies and prouinces into his handes which they gouerned, that afterwardes he might follow Pompey the better, leauing neuer an enemy behind him. In this iourney he was oftentimes himselfe in daunger, through the ambushes that were layd for him in diuers straunge sortes and places, and likely also to haue lost all his army for lacke of victuals. All this notwithstanding, he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in: vntill he had gotten their campe and armies into his handes, albeit that the Lieutenants themselues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæsar returned againe to ROME, Piso his father in law gaue him counsell to send Ambassadours vnto Pompey, to treate of peace. But Isauricus, to flatter Cæsar, was against it. Cæsar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had bene slaine in Sylla time: and did somewhat cut off the vsuries that did oppresse them, and besides, did make some such other ordinaunces as those, but very few. For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, & then did yeeld it vp of himselfe, and made himselfe Consull, with Seruilius Isauricus, and after that determined to follow the warres. All the rest of his armie he left comming on the way behind him, and went himselfe before with six hundred horse, and fiue legions onely of footemen, in the winter quarter, about the month of Ianuary, which after the ATHENIANS, is called POSIDEON. Then hauing past ouer the sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he sent his ships backe againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM, to transport the rest of his souldiers that could not come with that speede he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of body, & lusty youth, was decayed) being wearied with so many sundry battels as they had fought with their enemies: complained of Cæsar in this sort. To what end and purpose doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vsing vs like slaues and drudges? It is not our armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, shal we neuer be without our harnes on our backes, and our shieldes on our armes? should not Cæsar thinke, at the least whē he seeth our bloud & wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the miserie & paines that other men do feele? And now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercy of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods thēselues can not withstand: as if he fled before his enemies, & put fled thē not. Thus spending time with this talke, the souldiers still marching on, by small iourneys came at length vnto the citie of BRVNDVSIVM. But when they were come, & found that Cæsar had already passed ouer the sea, then they straight chaunged their complaints and mirids. For they blamed themselues, & tooke on also with their Captaines, because they had not made thē make more hast in marching: & sitting vpō the rocks & clyffes of the sea, they looked ouer the mayne sea towards the realme of EPIRVS, to see if they could discerne the ships returning backe, to transport thē ouer. Cæsar in the meane time being in the citie of APOLLONIA, hauing but a small army to fight with Pompey, it greeued him for that the rest of his army was so lōg a comming not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a daungerous determination, to imbarke vnknowen in a litle pynnase of twelue ores only, to passe ouer the sea again vnto BRVNDVSIVM: the which he could not do without great danger, cōsidering that all that sea was full of Pompeys ships & armies. So he tooke ship in the night apparelled like a slaue, & went aboord vpon this litle pynnase, & said neuer a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condition. The pynnase lay in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme & quiet, by reason of a litle wind that came frō the shore, which euery morning draue backe the waues farre into the maine sea. But that night, by ill fortune, there came a great wind from the sea that ouercame the land wind, in somuch as the force & strength of the wind fighting againſt the violence of the rage and waues of the ſea, the encounter was maruellous dangerous, the water of the riuer being driuen backe, and rebounding vpward, with great noyſe & danger in turning of the water. Therupon the Maiſter of the pynnaſe ſeeing he could not poſsibly get out of the mouth of this riuer, bad the Mariners to caſt about againe, & to returne againſt the ſtreame. Cæſar hearing that, ſtraight diſcouered himſelfe vnto the Maiſter of the pynnaſe, who at the firſt was amazed whē he ſaw him: but Cæſar thē taking him by the hād ſayd vnto him, good fellow, be of good cheare, & forwards hardily, feare not, for thou haſt Cæſar & his fortune with thee. Then the Mariners forgetting the danger of the ſtorme they were in, layd on lode with ores & laboured for life what they could againſt the winde, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they laboured in vaine, and that the pynnaſe tooke in aboundance of water, & was ready to ſincke: Cæſar then to his great griefe was driuē to returne backe againe. Who when he was returned vnto his campe, his ſouldiers came in great companies vnto him, & were very ſory, that he miſtruſted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his perſon in danger, to go fetch them that were abſent, putting no truſt in them that were preſent. In the meane time Antonius arriued, and brought with him the reſt of his army frō BRVNDVSIVM. Then Cæſar finding himſelfe ſtrōg enough, went & offered Pompey battell, who was paſsingly well lodged, for victualling of his campe both by ſea & land. Cæſar on the other ſide, who had no great plenty of victuals at the firſt, was in a very hard caſe: in ſomuch as his men gathered rootes, & mingled thē with milke, & eate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it alſo, & ſometime when they skirmiſhed with the enemies, & came alōgeſt by them that watched & warded, they caſt of their bread into their trenches, & ſayd: that as long as the earth brought forth ſuch fruites, they would neuer leaue beſieging of Pompey. But Pompey ſtraightly commaunded them, that they ſhould neither caſt thoſe wordes nor bread into their campe, fearing leaſt his mens harts would faile them, & that they would be affrayd, when they ſhould thinke of their enemies hardneſſe, with whom they had to fight, ſith they were weary with no paynes, no more then brute beaſts. Cæſars men did daily skirmiſh hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe, in the which Cæſar had euer the better, ſauing once only, at what time his men fled with ſuch feare, that all his campe that day was in great hazard to haue bene caſt away. For Pompey came on with his battell vpon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were ſlayne within the very gate and bulwarkes of their campe, they were ſo valiantly purſued. Cæſar ſtood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe: but he could not preuaile. For when he would haue taken the enſignes to haue ſtayed them, the enſigne bearers threw them down on the ground: ſo that the enemies tooke two and thirtie of them, and Cæſars ſelfe alſo ſcaped hardly with life. For ſeeking a great bigge ſouldier that fled by him, commanding him to ſtay, and turne his face to his enemy: the ſouldier being affrayed, lift vp his ſword to ſtrike at Cæſar. But one of Cæſars Pages preuenting him, gaue him ſuch a blow with his ſword, that he ſtrake off his ſhoulder. Cæſar that day was brought vnto ſo great extremitie, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or ſpightfull fortune, left off to follow his victorie, and retired into his campe, being contented to haue driuen his enemies into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he ſayd vnto them: the victorie this day had bene our enemies, if they had had a Captaine, that could haue told how to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more, then any night that euer he had. For ſtill his minde came with greas ſorow of the fowle fault he had committed in leading of his armie, of ſelfe will to remaine there ſo long by the ſea ſide, his enemies being the ſtronger by ſea: conſidering that he had before him a goodly country, riche and plentifull of all things, and goodly cities of MACEDON and THESSALIE, and had not the wit to bring the warre from thence, but to loſe his tyme in a place, where he was rather beſieged of his enemies for lacke of victuals, then that he did beſiege them by force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to ſee himſelfe ſo ſtraighted with victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raiſed his campe, intending to go ſet vpon Scipio, making account, that either he ſhould draw Pompey to battell againſt his will, whē he had not the ſea at his backe to furniſh him with plenty of victuals: or else that he should easily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnlesse he were aydet. This remoue of Cæsars campe, did much encourage Pompeys army and his Captaines, who would needes in any case haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey himselfe, he would in no respect hazard battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding himselfe well prouided of all things necessary to tary time, he thought it better to draw this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to consume the litle strength that remained in Cæsars army: of the which, the best men were maruellous well trained and good souldiers, & for valiantnesse, at one dayes battell, were incomparable. But on the other side again, to remoue here & there so oft, & to fortifie their campe where they came, and to besiege any wall, or to keepe watch all night in their armour: the most part of thē could not do it, by reason of their age, being then vnable to away with that paines, so that the weakenesse of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their harts. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease among them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate: yet was not this the worst. For besides, he had no store of money, neither could tell how to come by victuals: so that it seemed in all likelihood, that in very short time he would come to nothing. For these respectes, Pompey would in no case fight, & yet had he but Cato onely of his mind in that, who stucke in it the rather, because he would auoyd sheding of his coūtry mens bloud. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies slaine in the campe of his enemies, at the last skirmish that was betweene thē, the which were no lesse then a thousand persons: he couered his face, & went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, & blamed him, because he so long refrained from battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kings, saying, that he delayed this warre in this sort, because he would not leaue his authoritie to commaund them all, and that he was glad alwayes to see many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honour him, and wait vpon him. And Faonius also, a harebrayn fellow, frantickly counterfeiting the round and plaine speach of Cato, made as though he was maruellous angry, and sayd: is it not great pitie, that we shall not eate this yeare of TVSCVLVM figges, and all for Pompeys ambitious minde to raigne alone? & Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAYNE, (where, because he had but ill successe, he was accused of treason, that for money he had sold his army vnto Cæsar:) he went busily asking, why they fought not with that Marchant, vnto whom they sayd he had sold the prouince of SPAYNE? So that Pompey with these kind of speaches, against his will, was driuen to follow Cæsar, to fight with him. Then was Cæsar at the first, maruellously perplexed, & troubled by the way: because he found none that would giue him any victuals, being despised of euery man, for the late losse and ouerthrow he had receiued. But after that he had taken the citie of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meete with plenty of victuals to relieue his army with: but he straungely also did rid them of their disease. For the souldiers meeting with plentie of wine, drinking hard, and making mery: draue away the infection of the pestilence. For they disposed thēselues vnto dauncing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the way: in somuch that drinking druncke they ouercame their disease, and made their bodies new againe. When they both came into the country of PHARSALIA, and both campes lay before the other: Pompey returned againe to his former determination, and the rather, because he had ill signes & tokens of misfortune in his sleepe. For he thought in his sleepe that whē he entred into the Theater, all the ROMAINES receiued him with great clapping of hands. Whereupon, they that were about him grew to such boldnesse and securitie, assuring themselues of victorie: that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a braucrie contended betweene themselues, for the chiefe Bishoppricke which Cæsar had. Furthermore, there were diuers that sent vnto ROME to hyre the neerest houses vnto the market place, as being the fittest places for Praetors, and Consuls: making their account already, that those offices could not scape them, incontinently after the warres. But besides those, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAINE Knights were maruellous desirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with glistering gilt armours, their horses fat and very finely kept, and themselues goodly young men, to the number of seuen thousand, where the Gentlemen of Cæsars side, were but one thousand onely. The number of his footemen also were much after the same reckoning. For he had fiue & forty thousand against two & twenty thousand. Wherefore Cæsar called his soul-diers together, & told them how Cornificius was at hād, who brought two whole legions, & that he had fifteen ensignes led by Calenus; the which he made to stay about MEGARA and Athens. Then he asked thē if they would tary for that ayde or not, or whether they would trie the battell themselues alone. The souldiers cryed out to him, and prayed him not to differre battell, but rather to deuise some meth to make the enemy fight assoone as he could.

Then as he sacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his army: the first beast was no sooner sacrificed, but his Soothsayer assured him that he should fight within three dayes. Cæsar asked him againe, if he saw in the sacrifices, any lucky signe, or token of good lucke. The Soothsayer answered, for that, thou shalt aunswer thy selfe, better then I can do: for the gods do promise a marueilous great chaunge, & alteration of things that are now, vnto an other cleane contrary. For if thou beest well now, doest thou thinke to haue worse fortune hereafter? & if thou be ill, assure thy selfe thou shalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to visite the watch, men saw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cæsars campe, and fell downe in Pompeys. In the morning also, when they relieued the watch, they heard a false allarme in the enemies campe, without any apparāt cause: which they commōly call a sodaine feare, that makes men besides themselues. This notwithstanding, Cæsar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raised his campe from thence, & to haue gone towardes the citie of SCOTVSA: and his tents in his campe were already ouer-throwen whē his scoutes came in with great speed, to bring him newes that his enemies were preparing themselues to fight. Thē he was very glad, & after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he set his men in battell ray, & deuided them into three squadrons: giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left wing vnto Antonius, and placed himselfe in the right wing, choosing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But seeing that against that, his enemies had set all their horsemen: he was halfe affrayd when he saw the great number of them, & so braue besides. Wherfore he closely made six ensignes to come from the rereward of his battel, whom he had layd as an ambush behind his right wing, hauing first appointed his souldiers what they should do, whē the horsemen of the enemies came to giue thē charge. On the other side, Pompey placed himselfe in the right wing of his battell, gaue the left wing vnto Domitius, & the middle battel vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMAINE knights (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left wing, of purpose to enuiron Cæsars right wing behind, and to giue their hottest charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their account, that there was no squadrō of footemē how thick soeuer they were, that could receiue the charge of so great a troupe of horsemen, and that at the first onset, they should ouerthrow them all, & march vpon their bellies. Whē the trumpets on either side had sound the allarme to the battell, Pompey cōmanded his footemen that they should stād still without sturring, to receiue the charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherefore Cæsar afterwards sayd, that Pompey had cōmitted a fowle fault, not to consider that the charge which is giuen running with fury, besides that it giueth the more strength also vnto their blowes, doth set mēs harts also a fire: for the cōmon hurling of all the souldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that sets men a fire. Then Cæsar making his battell march forward to giue the onset, saw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whom he had also great confidence) speaking to his souldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloude by his name, and sayd vnto him: well, Caius Crassinius, what hope shall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crassinius casting vp his hand, aunswered him aloud: this day, O Cæsar, we shall haue a noble victory, and I promise thee ere night thou shalt praise me alyue or dead. When he had told him so, he was himself the formost man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, being about six score men, and making a lane through the foremost rankes, with great slaughter he entred far into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this sort, he was thrust in at length in the mouth with a sword, that the point of it came out againe at his necke. Now the footemen of both bat-tels being come to the sword, the horsemen of the left wing of Pompey, did march as fiercely also, spreading out their troupes, to compasse in the right wing of Cæsars battell. But before they began to giue charge, the six ensignes of footemen which Cæsar had layd in ambush behind him, they began to runne full vpon them, not throwing away their darts farre off as they were wont to do, neither striking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to seeke to hit them full in the eyes, & to hurt them in the face, as Cæsar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty young Gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vsed to see themselues hurt, & the which, being in the pryme of their youth and beautie, would be affrayd of those hurts, aswell for the feare of the present danger to be slayne, as also for that their faces should not for euer be deformed. As indeede it came to passe, for they could neuer abide that they should come so neare their faces, with the points of their dartes, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselues, they began at length cowardly to flye, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to set vpon the squadron of the footemen behind, and slue them. Then Pompey seeing his horsemen from the other wing of his battell, so scattered and dispersed, flying away: forgat that he was any more Pompey the great which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whose wits the goddes had taken from him, being affrayed and amazed with the slaughter sent from aboue, and so retired into his tent speaking neuer a word, and sat there to see the end of this battell. Vntill at length all his army being ouerthrowen, and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that stood to defend the same. Then as a man come to himselfe againe, he spake but this onely word: What, euen into our campe? So in haste, casting off his coate armour and apparell of a generall, he shifted him, and put on such, as became his miserable fortune, and so stale out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himselfe into the handes of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miserably slayne: we haue set it forth at large in his life. Then Cæsar entring into Pompeys campe, and seeing the bodies layed on the grounde that were slayne, and others also that were a killing, sayd, fetching a great sigh: it was their owne doing, and against my will. For Caius Cæsar, after he had won so many famous conquestes, and ouercome so many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his army. Asinius Pollio writeth, that he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and sayth furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the sword in the campe, were slaues and bondmen, and that there were not slayne in all at this battell, aboue six thousand souldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, Cæsar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwardes slue Cæsar himselfe: and it is reported, that Cæsar was very sory for him, when he could not immediatly be founde after the battell, and that he reioyced againe, when he knew he was aliue, and that he came to yeeld himselfe vnto him. Cæsar had many signes and tokens of victorie before this battell: but the notablest of all other that hapned to him, was in the citie of TRALLES. For in the temple of victorie, within the same citie, there was an image of Cæsar, and the earth all about it very hard of it selfe, and was paued besides with hard stone: and yet some say that there sprang vp a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PADNA, Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothsayer, (a country man and friend of Titus Liuius the Historiographer) was by chaunce at that time set to behold the flying of birdes. He (as Liuie reporteth) knew the very tyme when the battell began, and told them that were present, euen now they giue the onset on both sides, and both armies do meete at this instant. Then sitting downe againe to consider of the birdes, after he had bethought him of the signes: he sodainly rose vp on his feete, and cryed out as a man possessed with some spirit, oh, Cæsar, the victorie is thine. Euery man wondring to see him, he tooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an othe that he would neuer put it on againe, till the euent of his prediction had proued his art true. Liuie testifieth, that it so came to passe. Cæsar afterwardes giuing freedome vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wan in their country, he followed after after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gaue freedom also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theophanes sake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release ASIA also, the third part of the tribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the ROMAINES. Then he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was slaine: and detested Theodotus that presented him Pompeys heade, and turned his head at toe side because he would not see it. Nothwithstanding, he tooke his seale, and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he curteously vsed all Pompeys friends & familiars, who wandring vp & downe the country, were taken of the king of ÆGYPT, and wan them all to be at his comandement. Continuing these courtesies, he wrote vnto his friends at ROME, that the greatest pleasure he tooke of his victorie, was, that he daily saued the liues of some of his countrey men that bare armes against him. And for the warre he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not haue done it, but that he willingly did it for the loue of Cleopatra: Wherein he wan litle honor, and besides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault vpon the king of ÆGYPTS ministers, but specially on Pothinus the Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the kings seruants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driuen Cleopatra from the Court, secretly laide waite all the waies he could, how he might likewise kill Cæsar. Wherefore Cæsar hearing an inckling of it, beganne thenceforth to spend all the night long in feasting and banqueting, that his person might be in the better safety. Besides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch spake many things openly not to be borne, onely to shame Cæsar, and to stirre vp the people to enuie him. For he made his souldiers haue the worst and oldest wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complaine of it, he told them, they must be contented, seeing they eate at an other mans cost. And he would serue them also at the table in treene & earthen dishes, saying that Cæsar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did owe vnto him: which was, a thousande seuen hundred and fiftie Myriades, whereof Cæsar had before forgiuen seuen hundred & fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a Myllion to pay his souldiers withall. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importance, & afterwards that he should at more leasure recouer his debt, with the kings good will and fauour. Cæsar replyed vnto him, and said, that he would not aske counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his affaires, but would be paid: and therupon secretly sent for Cleopatra which was in the country to come vnto him. She only taking Apollodorus SICILIAN of all her friends, tooke a litle bote, & went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foote of the castle. Then hauing no other mean to come into the court without being knowen, she laid her selfe down vpon a mattresse or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied and bound vp together like a bundle with a great leather thong, & so tooke her vp on his backe, and brought her thus hamred in this fardle vnto Cæsar, in at the castle gate. This was the first occasion (as it is reported) that made Cæsar to loue her: but afterwardes, when he saw her sweete conuersation and pleasant entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her againe vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly should raigne together. Vppon this new reconciliation, a great feast being prepared, a slaue of Cæsars that was his barber, the fearfullest wretch that liued, stil busily prying and listening abroad in euery corner, being mistrustfull by nature: found that Pothinus and Achillas did lie in waite to kill his maister Cæsar. This being proued vnto Cæsar, he did set such sure watch about the hall, where the feast was made, that in fine, he slew the Eunuch Pothinus himselfe. Achillas on the other side, saued himself and fled vnto the kings campe, where he raised a maruellous dangerous and difficult warre for Cæsar: because he hauing then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight against a great and strong citie. The first danger he fell into, was for the lacke of water he had: for that his enemies had stopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water vnto the castle. The second danger he had, was, that seeing his enemies came to take his shippes from him, he was driuen to repulse that danger with fire, the which burnt the arsenall where the ships lay, and that notable librarie of ALEXANDRIA withall. The third danger was in the battell by sea, that was fought by the tower of Phar: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by sea, he lept from the peere into a bote. Then the ÆGYPTIANS made towards him with their owers, on euerie side: but hee leaping into the sea, with great hazard saued himselfe by swimming.

It is said, that then holding diuerse bookes in his hand, he did neuer let them go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, and swamme with the other hand, notwithstanding that they shot maruellously at him, and was driuen somtime to ducke into the water: howbeit the bote was drowned presently. In fine, the king comming to his men that made warre with Cæsar, he went against him, and gaue him battell, and wanne it with great slaughter, and effusion of bloud. But for the king, no man could euer tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cæsar made Cleopatra his sister, Queene of ÆGYPT, who being great with childe by him, was shortly brought to bed of a sonne, whō the ALEXANDRIANS named Cæsarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and so going into ASIA, there it was told him that Domitius was ouerthrowen in battell, by Pharnaces the sonne of king Mithridates, & was fled out of the realme of PONTE, with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victorie, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA, and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needes attempt to win ARMENIA the lesse, procuring all those kings, princes, and gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts to rebell against the ROMAINES. Therupon Cæsar went thither straight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the citie of ZELA, where he slew his armie, & draue him out of all the realme of PONTE. And because he would aduertise one of his friends of the sodainnesse of this victorie, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I saw, I ouercame. These three wordes ending all with like sound and letters in the Latin, haue a certaine short grace, more pleasant to the eare, then can be well expressed in any other tongue. After this, he returned againe into ITALY, and came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the second time, which office before was neuer graunted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then he was chosen Consull for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very ill spoken of, for that his souldiers in a mutine hauing slaine two Prætors, Cosconius and Galba, he gaue them no other punishment for it, but in stead of calling them souldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto euery one of them a thousand Drachmas a man, and great possessions in ITALIE. He was much misliked also for the desperate parts and madnes of Dolabella, for the couetousnesse of Anitius, for the drunkennesse of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pompeys house be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not bigge enough for him, wherewith the ROMAINES were maruellously offended. Cæsar knew all this well enough, and would haue bene contented to haue redressed them: but to bring his matters to passe he pretended, he was driuen to serue his turne by such instruments. After the battell of Pharsalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICKE, king Iuba ioyned with them, & leauied a great puisant army. Wherefore Cæsar determined to make warre with them, & in the middest of winter, he tooke his iorney into SICILE. There, because he would take all hope from his Captaines and souldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very sands by the sea side, and with the next gale of winde that came, he tooke the sea with three thousand footemen, and a fewe horsemen. Then hauing put them a land, vnwares to them, he hoysed saile againe, to go fetch the rest of his armie, being affraid least they should meete with some daunger in passing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was tolde him that his enemies trusted in an ancient Oracle, which said, that it was predestined vnto the family of the Scipioes to be conquerors in AFRICK: either of purpose to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwise in good earnest to take the benefite of this name (giuen by the Oracle) vnto himselfe, in all the skirmishes and battels fought, he gaue the charge of his army, vnto a man of meane qualitie and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the race of Scipio AFRICAN, & made him alwaies his Generall when he fought. For he was eftsoones compelled to wearie and harrie his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had come enough, nor his beasts forrage, but the souldiers were driuen to take sea weedes, called Alga: and (washing away the brackishnesse thereof with fresh water, putting to it a litle herbe called dogges tooth) to cast it so to their horse to eate. For the NVMIDIANS (which are light horsemen, and very readie of seruice) being a great number together, would be on a sodaine in euery place, and spred all the fieldes ouer thereabout, so that no man durst peepe out of the campe to goe for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were staying to beholde an AFRICAN doing doing notable things in dauncing and playing with the flute: they being set downe quietly to take their pleasure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time giuen their slaues their horses to hold, the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, compassed them in round about, and slew a number of them in the field, and chasing the other also that fled, followed them pell mell into their campe. Furthermore had not Cæsar himselfe in person, and Asinius Pollio with him gone out of the campe to the rescue, and staied them that fled: the warre that day had bene ended. There was also an other skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cæsar taking the ensigne bearer by the coller that caried the Eagle in his hand, stayed him by force, and turning his face, told him: see, there be thy enemies. These aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battell: and leauing Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neere to other, he did fortifie himselfe by the citie of THAPSACVS, aboue the lake, to be a safe refuge for them all in this battell. But whilest he was busie intrenching of himselfe, Cæsar hauing marvellous speedily passed through a great country full of wood, by bypathes which men would never haue mistrusted: he stale vpon some behinde, and sodainely assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following this first good happe he had, he went forthwith to set vpon the campe of Afranius, the which he tooke at the first onset, and the campe of the NVMIDIANS also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three campes, and slew fifty thousand of his enemies, & lost but fiftie of his souldiers. In this sort is set downe the effect of this battell by some writers. Yet others do write also, that Cæsar selfe was not there in person at the execution of this battell. For as he did set his men in battell ray, the falling sickenesse tooke him, whereunto he was giuen, and therefore feeling it coming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a castle not farre from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his rest till the extremitie of his disease had left him. Now, for the Prætor and Consuls that scaped from this battell, many of them being taken prisoners, did kill themselues, and others also Cæsar did put to death: but he being specially desirous of all men else to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with all possible speede vnto the citie of VTICA, whereof Cato was Gouernour, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Notwithstanding being certified by the way that Cato had slaine himself with his own hands, he then made open shew that he was very sory for it, but why or wherfore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæsar said at that present time: O Cato, I enuie thy death, because thou didst enuy my glory, to saue thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that hee wrote afterwards against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull hart towards him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his hands: that being dead did speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemencie he shewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuers others that had borne armes against him. Some report, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any priuate malice he had to his death, as for enuill ambition, vpon this occasion. Cicero had written a booke in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likelihood was verie well liked of, by reason of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subiect thereof. Cæsar therewith was maruellously offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death he was author, was euen as much as to accuse himselfe: and therefore he wrote a letter against him, and heaped vp a number of accusations against Cato, and intituled the booke Anticaton. Both these bookes haue fauourers vnto this day, some defending the one for the loue they bare to Cæsar, & others allowing the other for Catoes sake. Cæsar being now returned out of AFRICKE, first of all made an oration to the people, wherein he greatly praised and commended this his last victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered so many countries vnto the Empire of ROME, that he could furnish the common wealth yearely, with two hundred thousand bushels of wheate, and twentie hundred thousand pound weight of oyle. Then he made three triumphs, the one for ÆGYPT, the other for the kingdome of PONTE, and the third for AFRICKE: not because he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose sonne being likewise called Iuba, being then a young boy, was led captiue in the shewe of this triumph. But this his imprisonment fell out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous

NVMIDIAN, by the studie he fel vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the wisest historiographers of the GRECIANS. After these three triumphes ended he very liberally rewarded his souldiers: & to curry fauor with the people, he made great feasts and common sports. For he feasted all the ROMAINES at one time, at two and twenty thousand tables, and gaue them the pleasure to see diuers sword plaiers to fight at the sharpe, & battels also by sea, for the remembrance of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long before. Then after all these sports, he made the people (as the manner was) to be mustered: and where there were at the last musters before, three hundred and twentie thousande citizens, at this muster only there were but a hundred and fiftie thousand. Such misery and destruction had this ciuill warre brought vnto the common wealth of ROME, and had consumed such a number of ROMAINES not speaking at all of the mischieues and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of ITALY, and to the other prouinces pertaining to ROME. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Consull the fourth time, & went into SPAINE to make warre with the sonnes of Pompey: who were yet but very young, but had notwithstanding raised a maruellous great army together, and shewed to haue had manhoode and courage worthie to commaund such an armie, insomuch as they put Cæsar himselfe in great daunger of his life. The greatest battell that was fought betwene them in all this warre, was by the citie of MVNDA For then Cæsar seeing his men sorely distressed, and hauing their hands full of their enemies: he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them: what, are ye not ashamed to be beaten and taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your owne handes to these young boyes? And so, with all the force he could make, hauing with much a doe put his enemies to flight: he slew aboue thirtie thousand of them in the fielde, and lost of his owne men a thousand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his friends, that he had often before fought for victorie, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his owne life. He wanne this battell on the very feast day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of ROME, about foure yeares before, to beginne this ciuill warre. For his sonnes, the younger scaped from the battell: but within few dayes after, Diddius brought the head of the elder. This was the last warre that Cæsar made. But the triumph he made into ROME for the same, did as much offend the ROMAINES, and more, then any thing that euer he had done before: because he had not ouercome Captaines that were strangers, nor barbarous kings, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man in ROME, whom fortune had ouerthrowen. And because he had plucked vp his race by the roote, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumph so, for the calamities of his countrie, reioycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men: that he was compelled to doe that he did. And the rather they thought it not meete, because he had neuer before sent letters nor messengers vnto the common wealth at ROME, for any victorie that he had euer wonne in all the ciuill warres: but did alwaies for shame refuse the glorie of it. This notwithstanding, the ROMAINES inclining to Cæsars prosperitie, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for them to take breath a litle, after so many troubles and miseries as they had abidden in these ciuill warres: they chose him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this absolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraide to be deposed: Cicero propounded before the Senate, that they should giue him such honors, as were meete for a man: howbeit others afterwards added to, honours beyonde all reason. For, men striuing who should most honor him, they made him hatefull and troublesome to themselues that most fauoured him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnes and honors which they gaue him. Thereupon, it is reported, that euen they that most hated him, were no lesse fauorers and furtherers of his honors, then they that most flattered him: because they might haue greater occasions to rise, and that it might appeare they had iust cause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for himselfe, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did so honorably behaue himselfe, that there was no fault to be found in him: and therefore mee thinkes, amongst other honors they gaue him, he rightly deserued this, that they should build him a temple of clemencie, to thanke him for his courtesie he had vsed vnto them in his victorie. For he pardoned many many of them that had borne armes againſt him, and furthermore, did preferre ſome of them to honour and office in the common wealth: as amongſt others, Caſſius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwen downe, he cauſed them to be ſet vp againe: whereupon Cicero ſaid then, that Cæſar ſetting vp Pompeys images againe he made his owne to ſtand the ſurer. And when ſome of his friends did counſell him to take a guard for the ſafetie of his perſon, and ſome alſo did offer themſelues to ſerue him: he would neuer conſent to it, but ſaide, it was better to die once, then alwaies to be affraide of death. But to win himſelfe the loue and good will of the people, as the honorableſt guard and beſt ſafetie he could haue: he made common feaſts againe, and generall diſtributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the ſouldiers alſo, hee repleniſhed many cities againe with inhabitantes, which before had bene deſtroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which the nobleſt & chiefeſt cities were theſe two, CARTHAGE & CORINTH, and it chaunced alſo, that like as aforetime they had beene both taken and deſtroyed together, euen ſo were they both ſet a foote againe, and repleniſhed with people, at one ſelfe time. And for great perſonages, he wanne them alſo, promiſing ſome of them, to make them Prætors and Conſuls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferrements, but to all men generally good hope, ſeeking all the waies he could to make euery man contented with his regne. Inſomuch as one of the Conſuls called Maximus, chauncing to die a day before his Conſulſhippe ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Conſull onely for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his houſe (as the maner was) to ſalute him, and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferrement, being newly choſen officer: Cicero pleaſantly ſaide, come, let vs make haſte, and be gone thither before his Conſulſhippe come out. Furthermore, Cæſar being borne to attempt all great enterpriſes, and hauing an ambitious deſire beſides to couet great honors: the proſperous good ſucceſſe he had of his former conqueſtes bred no deſire in him quietly to enioy the frutes of his labours, but rather gaue him hope of things to come, ſtill kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterpriſes, and deſire of new glory, as if that which he had preſent, were ſtale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with himſelfe as with an other man, and a certaine contention to ouercome the things he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, and made preparation alſo, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had ouercome them, to paſſe through HYRCANIA (compaſſing in the ſea Caſpium, and mount Caucaſus) into the realme of PONTVS, and ſo to inuade SCYTHIA: and ouerrunning all the countries, and people adioyning vnto high GERMANY, and GERMANY it ſelfe, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALIE, and ſo to enlarge the ROMAINE Empire round, that it might be euery way compaſſed in with the great ſea Oceanum. But whileſt he was preparing for this voiage, he attempted to cut the iſthme of the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, in the place where the citie of CORINTH ſtandeth. Then he was minded to bring the riuers of Anienes and Tiber, ſtraight from ROME, vnto the citie of CIRCEES, with a deepe channell and high bankes caſt vp on either ſide, and ſo to fall into the ſea at TERRACINA, for the better ſafety and commoditie of the marchants that came to ROME to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and ſeaw all the water of the mariſhes betwixt the cities of NOMENTVM and SETIVM, to make it firme lande, for the benefit of many thouſandes of people: and on the ſea coaſt next vnto ROME, to caſt great high bankes, and to cleanſe all the hauen about OSTIA, of rockes and ſtones hidden vnder the water, and to take away all other impedimentes that made the harborough dangerous for ſhippes, and to make new hauens and arſenals meete to harbour ſuch ſhippes, as did continually trafficke thither. All theſe things were purpoſed to be done, but tooke no effect. But, the ordinance of the kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confuſion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMAINES vſing then the ancient computation of the yeare, had not only ſuch incertainty and alteration of the moneth and times, that the ſacrifices and yearely feaſtes came by litle and litle to ſeaſons contrarie for the purpoſe they were ordained: but alſo in the reuolution of the ſunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMAINES themſelues, only the prieſts vnder-stood it. And therefore when they listed, they sodainly (no man being able to controll them) did thrust in a moneth aboue their ordinarie number, which they called in old time, * Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first, that deuised this way, to put a moneth betwene: but it was a weake remedie, and did litle helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæsar committing this matter vnto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time, did set foorth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMAINES doe vse vntill this present day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithstanding that enuied his greatnesse, did not sticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one saide, to morow the starre Lyra will rise: yea, said he, at the commandement of Cæsar, as if men were compelled so to say and thinke, by Cæsars edict. But the chiefest cause that made him mortally hated, was the couetous desire he had to be called king: which first gaue the people iust cause, and next his secret enemies honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this honor & dignitie, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybiline prophecies, how the ROMAINES might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwise that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold besides, that Cæsar returning to ROME from the citie of ALBA, when they came to salute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, and Cæsar also angry, he said he was not called king, but Cæsar. Then euery man keeping silence, he went his way heauy & sorowfull. When they had decreed diuers honors for him in the Senate, the Consuls and Prætors accõpanied with the whole assembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was set by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his absence. But he sitting still in his maiestie, disdaining to rise vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, answered them: that his honours had more neede to be cut off than enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the common wealth: insomuch as euerie man that might lawfully goe his way, departed thence very sorrowfully. Thereupon also Cæsar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his dublet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friendes, that his throte was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excuse this follie, he imputed it to his disease, saying, that their wittes are not perfit which haue his disease of the falling euil, when standing on their feete they speake to the common people, but are soone troubled with a trembling of their bodie, and a sodaine dimnesse and guidinesse. But that was not true. For he would haue risen vp to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friends (but rather a flatterer) would not let him, saying: what, doe you not remember that you are Cæsar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and doe their dueties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproach, abusing the Tribunes of the people in this sort. At that time, the feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in olde time men say was the feast of sheapheards or heard men, and is much like vnto the feast of the LYCIANS in ARCADIA. But howsoeuer it is, that day there are diuers noble mens sonnes, young men, (and some of them Magistrates themselues that gouerne then) which run naked through the citie, striking in sport them they meete in their way, with leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them giue place. And many noble women and gentle women also, goe of purpose to stand in their way, and doe put forth their handes to be striken, as schollers hold them out to their schoolemaster, to be striken with the ferula: perswading themselues that being with childe, they shall haue good deliuerie, and also being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with childe. Cæsar sate to beholde that sport vpon the pulpit for orations, in a chaire of golde, apparelled in triumphing manner. Antonius who was Consull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy course. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cæsar, and presented him a Diadeame wreathed about with laurell. Whereupon there rose a certaine cry of reioycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpose. But when Cæsar refused the Diadeame, then all all the people together made an outcry of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him again, there was a second shout of ioy, but yet of a few. But when Cæsar refused it againe the second time, then all the whole people shouted. Cæsar hauing made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereupon rose out of his chaire, and commanded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were set vp images of Cæsar in the city with Diadems vpon their heades, like kings. Those, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe: and furthermore, meeting with them that first saluted Cæsar as king, they committed them to prison. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes: because of Brutus, who had in old time driuen the kings out of Rome, and that brought the kingdome of one person, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Cæsar was so offended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneships, and accusing them, he spake also against the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to wit, beasts, and fooles. Hereuppon the people went straight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the first Brutus, and by his mother, of the house of the Seruilians, a noble house as any was in Rome, and was also nephew and sonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honors and fauor Cæsar shewed vnto him, kept him backe that of him selfe alone, hee did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his kingdome. For Cæsar did not onely saue his life, after the battell of Pharsalia when Pompey fled, and did at his request also saue many moe of his friends besides: but furthermore, he put a maruellous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Prætorship for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Consull, the fourth year after that, hauing through Cæsars friendship, obtained it before Cassius, who likewise made sute for the same: and Cæsar also, as it is reported, sayd in this contention, in deed Cassius hath alleaged best reason, but yet shall he not be chosen before Brutus. Some one day accusing Brutus while hee practised this conspiracy, Cæsar would not heare of it, but clapping his hand on his body, told them, Brutus will looke for this skinne: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue, deserued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions sake, hee would not shew him selfe vnthankefull or dishonorable. Now they that desired chaunge, and wished Brutus onely their Prince and Gouernor aboue all other: they durst not come to him them selues to tell him what they would haue him to doe, but in the night did cast sundry papers into the Prætors seate where hee gaue audience, and the most of them to this effect. Thou sleepest Brutus, and art not Brutus in deede. Cassius finding Brutus ambition sturred vp the more by these seditious bils, did pricke him forward, and egge him on the more, for a priuat quarrell he had conceiued against Cæsar: the circumstance whereof, we haue set downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæsar also had Cassius in great gealousie, and suspected him much: whereuppon he sayed on a time to his friends, what will Cassius doe, thinke ye? I like not his pale looks. An other time when Cæsars friends complained vnto him of Antonius and Dolabella, that they pretended some mischiefe towards him: he answered them againe, as for those fat men and smooth comed heads, quoth hee, I neuer reckon of them: but these pale visaged and carian leane people, I feare them most, meaning Brutus and Cassius. Certainely, destiny may easier be foreseene, then auoyded: considering the strange and wonderfull signes that were sayd to be seene before Cæsars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and spirites running vp and downe in the night, and also the solitary birdes to be seene at noone dayes sitting in the great market place: are not all these signes perhappes worth the noting, in such a wonderfull chaunce as happened. But Strabo the Philosopher writeth, that diuers men were seene going vp and downe in fire: and furthermore, that there was a slaue of the souldiers, that did cast a maruellous burning flame out of his hand, insomuch as they that saw it, thought he had bene burnt, but when the fire was our, it was found he had no hurt. Cæsar selfe also doing sacrifice vnto the goddes, found that one of the beastes which was sacrificed had no heart: and that was a strange thing in nature, how a beast could liue without a heart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothsayer that had giuen Cæsar warning long time afore, to take heede of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of that moneth) for on that day he should be in great daunger. That day being come, Cæsar going vnto the Senate house, and speaking merily vnto the Soothsayer, tolde him, the Ides of March be come: so be they, softly aunswered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past. Predictions & foreshewes of Cæsars death.

the very day before, Cæsar supping with Marcus Lepidus, sealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the bord: so talke falling out amongest them, reasoning what death was best: hee preuenting their opinions, cried out aloud, death vnlooked for. Then going to bed the same night as his maner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windowes and dores of his chamber flying open, the noise awoke him, and made him afraied when he saw such light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being fast a sleepe, weepe and sigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable speaches. For shee dreamed that Cæsar was slaine, and that shee had him in her armes. Others also do deny that shee had any such dreame, as amonest other, Titus Liuius writeth, that it was in this sort. The Senate hauing set vpon the top of Cæsars house, for an ornament and setting forth of the same, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia dreamed that shee saw it broken down, and that shee thought shee lamented and wept for it. Insomuch that Cæsar rising in the morning, shee prayd him if it wer possible, not to go out of the dores that day, but to adiorne the session of the Senate, vntill an other day. And if that hee made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would search further of the Soothsayers by their sacrifices, to know what should happen him that day. Thereby it seemed that Cæsar likewise did feare and suspect somewhat, because his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer giuen to any feare or superstition: and then, for that he saw her so troubled in minde with this dreame shee had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothsayers hauing sacrificed many beasts one after an other, tolde him that none did like them: then he determined to send Antonius to adiorne the session of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Brutus, surnamed Albinus, in whom Cæsar put such confidence, that in his last will and testament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conspiracy with Cassius and Brutus: he fearing that if Cæsar did adiorne the session on that day, the conspiracy would out, laughed the Soothsaiers to scorne, and reproued Cæsar, saying: that he gaue the Senate occasion to mislike with him, and that they might thinke hee mocked them, considering that by his commaundement they were assembled, and that they were ready willingly to graunt him all things, and to proclaime him king of all the prouinces of the Empire of ROME out of ITALY, and that he should weare his Diadem in all other places both by sea and land. And furthermore, that if any man should tell them from him, they should depart for that present time, and returne againe when Calpurnia should haue better dreames: what would his enemies and ill willers say, and how could they like of his friends words? And who could perswade them otherwise, but that they would thinke his dominion a seruitude vnto them, and tyrannicall in him selfe? And yet if it be so, sayd he, that you vtterly mislike of this day, it is better that you goe your selfe in person, and saluting the Senate, to dismisse them till an other time. Therewithall he tooke Cæsar by the hand, and brought him out of his house. Cæsar was not gone farre from his house, but a bondman, a stranger, did what hee could to speake with him: and when he saw he was put backe by the great prease and multitude of people that followed him, he went straight into his house, and put him selfe into Calpurnias hands to be kept, till Cæsar came backe againe, telling her that he had great matters to impart vnto him. And one Artemidorus also borne in the Ile of GNIDOS, a Doctor of Rethoricke in the Greeke tongue, who by meanes of his profession was very familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the most part of all their practises against Cæsar: came and brought him a litle bill written with his owne hand, of all that he ment to tell him. He marking how Cæsar receiued all the supplications that were offered him, and that hee gaue them straight to his men that were about him, prest nearer to him, and sayed: Cæsar, reade this memoriall to your selfe, and that quickly, for they be matters of great waight and touch you nearely. Cæsar tooke it of him, but could neuer read it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did salute him: but holding it still in his hand, keeping it to him selfe, went on withall into the Senate house. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was some man else that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to giue it Cæsar, but he was alwayes repulsed by the people. For these things, they may seeme to come by chaunce: but the place where the murther was prepared, and where the Senate were assembled, and where also there stood vp an image of Pompey dedicated by him selfe amongest other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater: all these were manifest manifeſt proofes that it was the ordinaunce of ſome god, that made this treaſon to be executed, ſpecially in that very place. It is alſo reported, that Caſſius (though otherwiſe hee did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterpriſe: hee did ſoftly call vppon it, to aide him. But the inſtant danger of the preſent time, taking away his former reaſon, did ſodainly put him into a furious paſſion, and made him like a man halfe beſides him ſelfe. Now Antonius, that was a faithfull friend to Cæſar, and a valiant man beſides of his handes, him, Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate houſe, hauing begunne a long tale of ſet purpoſe. So Cæſar comming into the houſe, all the Senate ſtoode vp on their feete to doe him honor. Then part of Brutus company and confederates ſtoode round about Cæſars chayre, and part of them alſo came towardes him, as though they made ſute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from baniſhment: and thus proſecuting ſtill their ſute, they followed Cæſar, till hee was ſet in his chaire. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after an other, becauſe the more they were denied, the more they preſſed vppon him, and were the earneſter with him: Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his hands, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the ſigne giuen the confederats to ſet vppon him. Then Caſca behinde him ſtrake him in the necke with his ſword, howbeit the wound was not great nor mortall, becauſe it ſeemed, the feare of ſuch a deuiliſh attempt did amaze him, and take his ſtrength from him, that he killed him not at the firſt blow. But Cæſar turning ſtraight vnto him, caught hold of his ſword, and held it hard: & they both cried out, Cæſar in Latin: O vile traitor Caſca, what doeſt thou? And Caſca in Greeke to his brother, brother, helpe mee. At the beginning of this ſtur, they that were preſent, not knowing of the conſpiracy, were ſo amazed with the horrible ſight they ſaw: they had no power to flie, neither to helpe him, not ſo much, as once to make any outcry. They on the other ſide that had conſpired his death, cõpaſſed him in on euerie ſide with their ſwords drawen in their hands, that Cæſar turned him no where, but hee was ſtriken at by ſome, and ſtill had naked ſwords in his face, and was hacked and mangled among them, as a wilde beaſt taken of hunters. For it was agreede among them, that euery man ſhould giue him a wound, becauſe all their parts ſhould be in this murther: and then Brutus him ſelfe gaue him one wound about his priuities. Men report alſo, that Cæſar did ſtill defend him ſelfe againſt the reſt, running euery way with his body: but when he ſaw Brutus with his ſword drawen in his hand, then he pulled his gowne ouer his head, and made no more reſiſtaunce, and was driuen either caſually, or purpoſedly, by the counſell of the conſpirators, againſt the baſe whereupon Pompeys image ſtoode, which ran all of a goare bloud till he was ſlaine. Thus it ſeemed, that the image tooke iuſt reuenge of Pompeys enemy, being throwen downe on the ground at his feete, and yeelding vp his ghoſt there, for the number of wounds he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twenty wounds vpon his body: and diuers of the conſpirators did hurt them ſelues, ſtriking one body with ſo many blowes. When Cæſar was ſlaine, the Senate (though Brutus ſtood in the middeſt amongſt them as though he would haue ſaied ſomewhat touching this fact) preſently ran out of the houſe, and flying, filled all the city with marueilous feare and tumult. Inſomuch as ſome did ſhut to their dores, others forſooke their ſhops and warehouſes, and others ranne to the place to ſee what the matter was: and others alſo that had ſeene it, ran home to their houſes again. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæſars chiefeſt friends, ſecretly conueying them ſelues away, fled into other mens houſes, and forſooke their own. Brutus and his confederats on the other ſide, being yet hot with this murther they had committed, hauing their ſwords drawen in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenaunce to flie, but otherwiſe boldly holding vp their heades like men of courage, and called to the people to defend their liberty, and ſtayed to ſpeake with euery great perſonage whom they met in their way. Of them, ſome followed this troupe, and went amongeſt them, as if they had beene of the conſpiracy, and falſely chalenged part of the honor with them; among eſt them was Caius Octauius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their vaine couetouſnes of honour, by Antonius, and Octauius Cæſar the younger: and yet had no part of that honor for the which they were put to death, neither did any man beleeue that they were any of the confederats, or of counsell with them. For they that did put them to death, tooke reuenge rather of the wil they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus and his confederates came into the market place to speake vnto the people, who gaue them such audience, that it seemed they neither greatly reproued, nor allowed the fact: for by their great silence they shewed, that they were sory for Cæsars death, and also that they did reuerence Brutus. Now the Senate granted generall pardon for all that was past, and to pacifie euery man, ordained besides, that Cæsars funerals should bee honored as a god, and established all things that he had done: and gaue certain prouinces also, and conuenient honors vnto Brutus and his confederates, whereby euery man thought all things were brought to good peace and quietnes againe. But when they had opened Cæsars testament, and found a liberall legacie of money, bequeathed vnto euery citizen of ROME, and that they saw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gashes of swords: then there was no order to keepe the multitude and cõmon people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, & stooles, and layed them all about the body, and setting them a fire, burnt the corse. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the firebrands, and went vnto their houses that had slaine Cæsar, to set them a fire. Other also ran vp and downe the city to see if they could meete with anie of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meete with neuer a man of them, because they had locked them selues vp safely in their houses. There was one of Cæsars friends called Cinna, that had a maruellous strange and terrible dreame the night before. He dreamed that Cæsar bad him to supper, and that he refused, & would not go: then that Cæsar tooke him by the hand, and led him against his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæsars body in the market place, notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an ague on him besides: he went into the market place to honor his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane sort asked him what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to an other, and that other vnto an other, so that it ranne straight through them all, that hee was one of them that murdered Cæsar: (for in deede one of the traitors to Cæsar, was also called Cinna as him selfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murderer, they fell vppon him with such fury, that they presently dispatched him in the market place. This sturre and fury made Brutus and Cassius more afraied, then of all that was past, and therefore within few dayes after, they departed out of ROME: and touching their doings afterwards, & what calamity they suffered till their deaths, we haue written it at large, in the life of Brutus. Cæsar died at six and fifty yeares of age: and Pompey also liued not passing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other fruite of all his raigne and dominion, which he had so vehemently desired all his life, and pursued with such extreame danger: but a vaine name only, and a superficial glory, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his countrey. But his great prosperity and good fortune that fauored him al his life time, did cõtinue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, pursuing the murtherers both by sea and land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all them that were actors or counsellers in the conspiracy of his death. Furthermore, of all the chances that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Cassius aboue all other, is most to be wondred at. For he being ouercome in battel at the iorney of Philippes, slue him selfe with the same sword, with the which he strake Cæsar. Againe, of signs in the element, the great comet which seuen nights together was seene very bright after Cæsars death, the eight night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnes of the sun was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, & shined not out, whereby it gaue but small heat: therefore the aire being very cloudy and dark, by the weaknes of the heat that could not come forth, did cause the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe fruit, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the ghost that appeared vnto Brutus shewed plainely, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cæsar. The vision was thus. Brutus being ready to passe ouer his army from the city of ABYDOS, to the other coast lying directly against it, slept euery night (as his manner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by report hee was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle sleepe, as euer man did) he thought he heard a noise at his tent dore, and looking towards the light of the lampe that waxed very dimme, he saw a horrible vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnes, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him maruellously afraid.

But

But when he saw that it did him no hurt, but stoode by his bed side, and sayd nothing: at length he asked him what he was. The image aunswered him: I am thy ill angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the city of PHILIPPES. Then Brutus replied againe, and sayed: well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirite presently vanished from him. After that time Brutus being in battell neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, against Antonius and Octauius Cæsar, at the first battell he wan the victory, and ouerthrowing all them that withstoode him, he draue them into young Cæsars campe, which he tooke. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared againe vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereuppon Brutus knowing hee should die, did put him selfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be slaine. So seeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowen, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre off, and there setting his swordes point to his brest, fell vpon it, and slue him selfe, but yet as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend that dispatched him.

The end of Cæsars life.

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

THE Orator Demades on a time florished in ATHENS, because in all his doings and sayings in the administration and gouernment of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in respect whereof he was eftsoones compelled, both in his counsell and lawes, to preferre many things to the dishonor of his city, saying, that they must pardon him, because he gouerned the shippewracks of his country. This was an arrogant speach: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion he sayd truely. For in deede Demades selfe was the shipwracke of the common weale, because hee liued so insolently, and gouerned so lewdly. Insomuch as Antipater sayd of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beast sacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion, which had to fight against the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were so obscured by the calamities of GREECE: that his fame was nothing so great as he deserued. For we must not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it selfe but weake, in these verses.

Demades arrogant saying.

When stormes of fore aduersities (ô king) doe men assaile, It daunts their corage, cuts their combs, and makes their hearts to quaile.

But we must onely giue place to fortune, who when shee frowneth vppon any good and vertuous men, her force is so great, that where they deserue honor and fauor, she violently heapeth false and malicious accusations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite which in deede it deserueth. And yet it seemeth to many, that free cities are most cruel vnto their good citizens in time of prosperity: because they flow in wealth & liue at ease, which maketh them of haughty minds. But it is cleane contrary. For aduersity commonly maketh mens maners sower, choller like, and very hasty: besides, slow to heare, churlish, and offended with euery little sharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, seemeth to call their aduersity in their teeth: and hee that telleth them plainely of their faultes, seemeth also to despise them. For like as honny sweete by nature, applied vnto woundes, doth bring both smart and paine: euen so, sharpe wordes, though profitable, doe bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with discretion & curtesie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth sweete and pleasaunt things μείλιχα, as yeelding and not striuing with contrariety, against that part of the minde, whereby we be angry and froward. For euen as sore eyes doe like to looke on blacke and darke colors, and can not abide the bright and glaring: so in a city, where for want of foresight and gouernment, things goe not well, men be so diuers and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and estate, that they had rather continue in their folly and daunger, then by sharpnes of words to be rebuked and restored. So that it being impossible to amend one fault with a greater, that common wealth must be in great danger, that when it hath most need of helpe, is lothest to receiue any: and he also hazardeth him selfe, that plainely telleth them their faultes. Like as therefore the Mathematician sayeth, that the sunne doth not altogether follow the motion of the highest heauen, not yet is moued directly contrary, but fetching a compasse a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approching and departing preserueth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature. Euen so, too seuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as also it is maruellous daungerous, not to correct offendors when they offend, for feare of the peoples displeasure. But the meane, sometime to yeeld vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to grant them things of pleasure, to demaund of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to doe many profitable things, when they seeke it not of them, by rigor and authority. In deed this meane is very hard to be obserued, because authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more musicall, nor concordance more perfit then that: and therefore it is said, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of seuerenes was in Cato the younger, for he could not fashion him selfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like his: neither did he win his estimation in the common wealth by flattering of them. And therefore Cicero sayed, that he was put by the Consulship, for that he behaued him selfe as though hee liued in the common wealth deuised by Plato, and not amongest the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely fruite: the which though men doe take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen so, the auncient simplicity of Catoes maner (hauing long time bene out of vse, and comming then to shew it selfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was in deede much praise worthy: but yet not the conuenientest, nor the fittest for him, because it aunswered nor respected not the vse and manners of his time. For he found not his country (as Phocion did) vtterly destroyed, but tossed in a dangerous tempest: and being not of authority like the pilot to take the sterne in hand, and gouerne the ship: hee tooke him selfe to tricking the sailes, and preparing the tacle, so to assist men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he so thwarted fortune (which seemed to haue sworne the ouerthrow of the estate of ROME) that with much a do, with great difficulty, and a long time after, she executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato and his vertue: with whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of gouernment. For there

difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades, & that of Epaminondas: betwixt wisdom and wisdom, as betwixt that of Aristides, & that of Themistocles: & betwixt iustice and iustice, as betwixt that of Numa, & that of Agesilaus. But the vertues of these men (to him that shall superficially regard, and lightly consider them) seeme all one in qualitie, in maner, & vse, both alike in temperance of curtesy with seueritie, & manhood with wisdom: a vigilant care for others, with presence of corage & securitie of mind for thēselues, abhorring all filthines & corruptiō, and imbracing cōstancy & loue of iustice: that for any mā to discerne the difference betwene thē, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgment. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we wil shew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I gesse he came of no base parentage. For if he had bene the sonne of a spoonmaker, as Idomeneus testifieth: Glaucippus the son of Hyperides, hauing in an inuectiue he wrote against him, rehearsed all the mischiefs he could of him, he would not haue forgottē to haue vpbraid him with his base parētage, neither he himself also (if that had bene true) had bene so well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a yong man, he was Platoes scholler, and afterwards Xenocrates scholler, in the schoole of Academia: and so, euen from his first beginning, he gaue himselfe to followe them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer ATHENIANS saw him weepe nor laugh, nor wash himselfe in any common bath, nor his hands out of his sleeues when he wore a long gown. For when he went to the warres, he would alwaies goe a foote, and neuer wore gowne, vnles it were extreame cold: and then the souldiers to mocke him withall, would say it was a signe of a sharpe winter, when they sawe Phocion in his gowne. Now, though in deede he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yet he had such a grymme looke withall, that no man had any desire to talke with him, but such as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocked him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My Masters, q. Phocion, the bending of my browes haue done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of these flatterers, haue made ye oftentimes to weepe. Furthermore, his maner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsels he vttered: but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnes. For as Zeno the Philosopher saieth, that the wise man should temper his wordes with wit and reason, before he vtter them: euen so was Phocions speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN said, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech, Phocion was very witty. For like as coynes of gold or siluer, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of goodnesse: euen so the excellencie of speech consisteth in signifying much by fewe wordes. And touching this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with himselfe: whereupon, one of his friendes seeing him so in his muses, said vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy minde is occupied about somewhat. Indeed it is so sayed he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to say to the people. For Demosthenes selfe litle esteeming all other Orators, when Phocion rose vp to speake, he would round his friendes in the eare, and told them: See, the matter of my wordes riseth. Peraduenture he ment it by his maners also: For when a good man speaketh, not a word only, but a wincke of an eie, or a nod of his head, doth counstruaile many artificiall words & speeches of Rethoricians. Furthermore, when he was a young man, he went to the wars vnder Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfit souldier, and in recompence thereof, hee reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, and made him wiser then he was. For Chabrias otherwise being very dull and slothfull of himselfe, when he came to fight, he was so hot and couragious, that he would thrust him selfe into danger, with the desperatest persons: and therefore for his rashenes it afterwards cost him his life, in the city of CHIO, where lanching out with his gally before the rest, he pressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wise to look to him selfe, and very quicke to execute: on the one side quickned Chabrias slownes, and on the other side also, by wisdome cooled his heate and fury. Chabrias therefore, being a good man and curteous, loued Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of seruice, making him famous amongest the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardiest enterprises. For by his meanes he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by sea, which he wanne by the Ile of NAXOS, giuing him the left wing of his armie, on which side the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he sooneſt put the enemies to flight. This battell being the first which the citie of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cause to loue Chabrias, and made them also to make account of Phocion, as of a noble soldier, and worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feast day of the great misteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yerely on the sixtenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called Auguſt) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time Chabrias sending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders, their confederates, and the shippes which they should send him: he gaue him twentie gallies to bring him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) said vnto him: if he sent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to haue more shipps: but if he sent him as an Ambassador vnto his friendes, then that one shippe would serue his turne. So he went with one galley onely: and after he had spoken with the cities, and courteously dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their confederates, with a great fleete of shippes and money, to carie vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely reuerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friends and kinsmen, and sought to make his sonne Cteſippus, an honeſt man: whom though he saw very wilde and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is sayed also, that when this yong man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous questions, seruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counsell, to reproue him, and to teach him the dutie of a Captaine: he could not but say, O Chabrias Chabrias: nowe doe I pay for the loue thou diddeſt beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy sonne. But when he saw that the heads of the citie of ATHENS had as it were by lot deuided among themselues the offices of warre and peace, and that some of them, as Eubulus, Ariſtophon, Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common speakers and preferrers of matters in councels and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Meneſtheus, Leoſthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment, of Pericles, Ariſtides, and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them seemed (as the Poet Archilochus saith)

To be both champions ſtout, of Marſis warlike band, And of the Muſes eke, the artes to vnderſtand.

He knew also, that Pallas the goddesse and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus disposed of himselfe in gouernment, he alwaies perswaded peace and quietnes, and yet was often chosen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did neuer sue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serue the common wealth. It is certaine that hee was chosen fiue and forty times Prætor, and was alwaies absent at the elections, but yet sent for. Whereupon all the wise men wondered to see the manner of the people towards him, considering that Phocion had neuer done nor sayed any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene against their desires: and how they vsed other gouernours notwithstanding, that were more pleasant and delightfull in their orations, like men to sport at, as it is sayed of kings, who after they haue washed their handes to go to their meate, doe vse to haue Iesters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other side when they had occasion of warres in deed, how then like wise men they could bethinke themselues, and choose the wiſeſt and stouteſt man of the city, and that most would withstand their mindes and desires. For on a time an oracle of Apollo Delphius, being openly red before them, which sayd, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the rest of the city: Phocion stepping forth before them all, bad them neuer seeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of al their doings. An other time he chaunced to say his opinion before all the people, the which they all praised and approued: but he saw they were so sodainely become of his minde, he turned backe to his friends, and asked them: alas, hath not some euill thing slipped my mouth vnwares? After that he put on his harnes again, and on his way towardes the campe: the rauens begamne againe to make a goodlier crie be- him. But thereupon he ſtaied ſtraight, and at length ſayed: ye ſhall crooke as loude as ye before ye feede on my carkas. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his ge, would needes haue him to leade them to giue charge vppon their enemies, but he uld not: thereupon they called him coward, and ſayed he durſt not. a man should be like wine, both sweet and sharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the first sight, seeme very courteous and gentle of conuersation, and vpon better acquaintance, proue churlish and dogged. It is reported also, that Hyperides the Orator one day should say to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my sharpenes, but consider if my sharpenes be without profit. As who should say, men are not troublesom, but for couetousnes only, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of insolencie and malice, did abuse & contemne their authoritie. Phocion on the other side, he neuer did Citizen hurt, for any priuate malice he bare him: but was euer sharpe and cruell to them, which were against any matter he preferred, for the benefit of the common wealth. For in all other things, he shewed himselfe maruellous lowly and curteous to euery bodie, & would be familiar with his aduersaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwise in danger of displeasure with the state. Insomuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he spake on the behalfe of a naughtie man, an offender: O sayed he, honest men neede no helpe. Another time, Aristogiton the Sycophant, being clapped vp in prison, sent vnto Phocion to pray him to come and speake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the prison to him, though his friends perswaded him to the contrary, and answered them: O let me alone, said he, for where could I see Aristogiton more gladly then in prison? Furthermore, when there went any army to sea out of ATHENS, if there were any other chosen generall but Phocion the townes and Ilandes all alongest the sea coast, (which were friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified their wals, filled vp their hauens, and brought their wiues, slaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, & open war proclaimed. Contrarily also, if Phocion had bene Captaine and generall, they would send out their shippes to the sea to meete him a farre off, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and so would bring him to their cities. King Philip secretly seeking to winne the Ile of EUBOEA, sent an armie thither out of MACEDON, and intised the townes by tyrantes to rebell: whereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN prayed in aide of the ATHENIANS, to take this Iland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not presently to ayde them. So Phocion was sent generall thither, but with a few men only, because they made account the men of that countrie would straight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebels, and brybed with king Philippes money, which he lauished out amongst them: so that he was brought into great danger. Thereupon he retyred to a litle hill that is seuered from the fields of Tamines, with a great large valley, and there fortified himselfe with that litle armie he had. Then he perswaded his Captaines not to care for all those rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forsooke their ensignes and Captaines, but that they should let them goe out of the campe where they would. For sayd he, such disobedient souldiers here will do vs no seruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to serue well: and at home also, knowing themselues in fault, for that they forsooke the campe without licence, they dare not complaine vppon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to set vppon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put themselues in readinesse, and not to sturre, vntill he had done sacrifice: but he staied long before he came, either because he could haue no lucky signes of the sacrifices, or else for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN supposing he deferred to march for feare, went himselfe first into the field, with certaine light horsemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes seeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him also, stragling out of the campe one after an other disorderly, and so did set vpon their enemies. The first being ouerthrowen, all the other dispersed themselues, and Plutarke himself fled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had bin theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion hauing ended his sacrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their campe, and set vpon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them also they slue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell should stand still, to receiue their men that were scattered vp and downe the fieldes: and in the meane space, he himselfe, with the choisest men of his army gaue charge vppon the enemies. The fight was cruell bemene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their persons: but of the all two young men fighting by their generall, (Glaucus the son of Polymedes, and Thallus, the sonne of Cineas) caried the praise awaye. And so did Cleophanes that daye also shewe himselfe very valiant. For he crying out still vpon the horsemen that fled, & perswading them to come and helpe their generall that was in danger: brought them backe againe, and thereby gotte the footmen the victorie. After this battell, he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the castell of ZARETRA, standing in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile drawe into a straightnes, enuironned on either side with the sea: and would not suffer his men to take any GRECIANS prisoners, fearing least the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people shamely in a rage, to put them to death. After all these things were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederats of the ATHENIANS straight wish for his iustice and courtesie: and the ATHENIANS themselues also knew his skilfulnes and manhood, for his successor Molossus, that was generall for the rest of the warre, delt so vndiscreetly: that he himselfe was taken prisoner there. Then king Philip being put in marueilous great hope, went with all his army into HELLESPONT, perswading himselfe, that he should straight take all CHERRONESVS, the cities of PERINTHE and BIZANTIVM. The ATHENIANS therupō determining to send aide, to preuent king Philips comming: the Orators made great sute, that Chares might be chosen Captaine: but he being sent thither with a good number of shippes, did no seruice worthy commendation, neither would the cities receiue his nauie into their hauens: but being suspected of euery man, and despised of his enemies, he was driuen to saile vp and downe, and to get money of the allyes. The people being incensed by the Orators, were marueilously offended, & repented themselues that they had sent aide vnto the BIZANTINES. Then Phocion rising vp, spake vnto the people, & told them, that it was no reason that mistrusting their confederates they should be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captaines that deserued to be mistrusted. For they, said he, doe make your confederates afraid of you, who without you notwithstanding can not saue themselues. The people changing their minds by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and sent him with an armie into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederates there, which was of great importance to saue the citye of BIZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was so great, that Cleon, the greatest man of vertue and authoritie in BYZANTIVM, and had before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy: he made sute for him vnto the citie. Thē the BYZANTINES would not suffer him (though he desired it) to campe without the wals of their citie, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongst them. Who, perceiuing how much the Citizens trusted them, did so honestly behaue themselues in their conuersation amongst them, that they gaue them no maner of cause to complaine of them: and shewed themselues so valiant besides in all battels and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man being afraied to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great discredite: where Phocion wanne some of his shippes, and recouered againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Furthermore, making diuers inuasions into his countries, he destroied his borders till that at length he was sore hurt there, and so driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great army that came against him to defend the country. Shorty after, the MEGARIANS secretly sent vnto him, to deliuer their city into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS vnderstood it, that they would preuent him: he called a common assembly earely in the morning, and told the people what message the MEGARIANS had sent vnto him. The people vpon this motion being determined to aid them: Phocion straight sounding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the assembly, gaue them no further leysure, but to take their weapons, and so led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiuing him, Phocion shut vp the hauen of NISAEA, and brought two long wals from the city vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: whereby he stood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the sea, the ATHENIANS were Lordes of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open war against king Philip, and had chosen other Captaines in his absence, and that hee was returned from the Iles: about all things, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the daunger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of these busie orators that was still accusing one or other, said vnto him: why Phocio, how dareſt thou, attẽpt to turn the ATHENIANS from war, hauing now their ſwords in their hands? yes truly, ſayd Phocion: though in warre I know I ſhall command thee, and in peace thou wilt command me. But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demoſthenes caried them away with his perſwaſions, who counſelled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee frend (ꝙ Phocion vnto him, let vs not diſpute where we ſhall fight, but conſider how we ſhall ouercome, the which if we can ſo bring to paſſe, be ſure we ſhall put the warre far enough from vs. For men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and danger, whereſoeuer they be. When the ATHENIANS had loſt a battell againſt Philip, the ſeditious Orators, that hunted after innouation, preferred Charidemus to be choſen generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the magiſtrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITS, they made ſuch earneſt ſute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at laſt (but with much a doe) they obtained, that the affaires of the citie might be put into Phocions hands and gouernment. He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the orator Demades moued that the citie of ATHENS would enter into the common treatie of peace, and cõmon aſſembly of the ſtates of GRECE, procured at king Philips requeſt: Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might vnderſtand what demaunds Philip would make at the aſſembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruerſnes of time could not be liked of them, and that he ſaw the ATHENIANS ſoone after repented them that they did not followe his counſell, when they heard they ſhould furniſh king Philip with ſhips and horſemen: then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withſtand that, which now ye haue conſented vnto. But ſithence it is ſo that you haue now paſt your conſents, you muſt be contented, and not be diſcouraged at it: remembring that your auncеſtors in times paſt haue ſometime commaunded, and other while obeyed others, and yet haue ſo wiſely and diſcreetely gouerned themſelues in both fortunes, that they haue not onely ſaued their citie, but all GRECE beſides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would ſtraight haue made bonfires and ſacrifices to the goddes for the good newes: but Phocion would not ſuffer them, and ſaid, that it was a token of a baſe minde, to reioyce at any mans death, and beſides that, the armie which ouerthrewe you at CHERONIA, hath not yet loſt but one man. And when Demoſthenes alſo would commonly ſpeake ill of Alexander, and ſpecially when he was ſo neere THEBES with his armie: Phocion rehearſed vnto him theſe verſes of Homer:

To reioyce at any mans hurt ſheweth a baſe mind, and vile nature.

How great a folly is it for to ſtand Againſt a cruell king, VVhich being armd and hauing ſword in hand, Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is ſuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou caſt the city into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not ſuffer them to caſt them ſelues away: for to that end haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernment. And afterwards alſo, when Alexander had raſed the city of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus, and that the whole aſſembly and counſell not knowing what aunſwere to make, did all caſt their eyes vpon Phocion, and cried vnto him to ſay his opinion: he then roſe vppe, and taking one of his friendes vnto him called Nicocles, whom he loued and truſted aboue all men elſe, he ſayed thus openly vnto them. Theſe men whome Alexander requireth, haue brought this city to this extremity, that if he required Nicocles here, I would giue my conſent to deliuer him: For I would thinke my ſelfe happy to loſe my life, for all your ſafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartely ſory (ſaid he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the city for ſuccour: yet I aſſure yee, it is better one city mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is beſt to intreate the Conquerour for both, rather then to our certaine deſtruction to fight with him that is the ſtronger. It is ſayed alſo that Alexander refuſed the firſt decree which the people offered him vppon Phocions requeſt, and ſent away the Ambaſſadours, and would not ſpeake with them. But the ſecond, which which Phocion himselfe brought, he tooke: being told by his fathers olde seruantes that king Philip made great account of him, whereuppon Alexander, did not onely giue him audience, and grant his request, but further followed his counsell. For Phocion perswaded him, if he loued quietnes, to leaue warre if he desired fame, then that he should make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humor with such talke and discours as he thought would like him best: he so altered and softned Alexanders dispositiõ, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS should looke to their affaires, for if he should dye, he knew no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, because he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend: he made so much of him, that he more honored him, then all the rest of his friends. To this effect, Duris the historiographer writeth that when Alexãder was grown very great, and had ouercom king Darius: he left out of his letters this word Chærin (to wit, ioy, & health) which he vsed commonly in all the letters he wrote, and would no more honor any other with that manner of salutation, but Phocion, and Antipater. Chares also writeth the same. And they all doe confesse, that Alexander sent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundreth siluer talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him such a great reward, aboue all the other Citizens of ATHENS. Because sayd they, he only esteemeth thee to be a good, and honest man. Phocion replied again, then let him giue me leaue to be that I seeme, and am whilst I liue. The messengers would not so leaue him, but followed him home to his house, where they saw his great husbãdry and thriftines. For they found his wife her selfe baking, & he himself drew water before them, out of the well to wash his feet. But then they were more earnestly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings present, and were offended with him, saying it was a shame for Alexanders friend to liue so miserably and beggarly as he did. Then Phocion seing a poore olde man goe by, in a threadbare gowne, asked them whether they thought him worse then he? No, God forbid, answered they againe. Then replyed he againe, he liues with lesse then I doe, and yet is contented, and hath enough. To be short, sayed he, if I should take this summe of money and occupie it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other side, if I occupie it, I shall make all the citie speake ill of the king and me both. So this great present was sent backe from ATHENS, whereby he shewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not such gold and siluer, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote again vnto Phocio, that he did not reckõ them for his frends, that would take nothing of him: Phocion notwithstanding would not take the money, but onely requested him for his sake, that he would set these men at libertie, which were kept prisoners in the citie of SARDIS, for certen accusations layed against them: Echecrates the Rethoritian, Athenodorus borne in the citie of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus & Spartus. Alexander presently set them at liberty, & sent Craterus into MACEDON, comanding him to giue Phocio the choice of one of these foure cities of ASIA which he liked best: CIOS, GERGITHA, MYLASSIS, ELEA: sending him worde, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuse this offer, than he was at the first. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is sene yet at this day in the village of MELITA, set forth with platesof copper, but otherwise very meane, and without curiositie. For his wiues he married, there is no mention made of the first saying that Cephisodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife she was no lesse famous at ATHENS, for her honestie and good housewiuerie: then Phocion for his iustice and equitie. And for proofe thereof, it is reported that the ATHENIANS being one day assembled in the Theater, to see new tragedies plaied, one of the players when he should haue come vpon the scaffold, to haue played his part, asked the setter forth of the plaies the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite vppon her, because he was to playe the part of the Queene. The setter forth of the plaies denying him, the player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, & would not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter forth of the plaies, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cried out vnto him: doest thou not see Phocions wife that goeth vppe and downe the cittie with one mayde onely waiting vpon her? and wilt thou playe the foole, and marre the modestie of the women of ATHENS? the people hearing his wordes, filled all the Theater with ioy and clapping of hands. The same Ladye, when a certen gentlewoman of IONIA came to ATHENS to see her, and shewed her all her rich iewels and pretious stones she had: she answered her againe, all my riches and iewels, is my husband Phocion, who these twentie yeares together hath continually bene chosen generall for the ATHENIANS. Phocions sonne telling his father on a time, that he was desirous to contend with other young men for the victorie, who should cunninglieſt leape out, and get vp againe into the charets or coches, running full course at the feasts Panathenæa at ATHENS: his father was contented he should, not that he was desirous his sonne should haue the honor of the victorie, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better manner, for that he was a dissolute young man, and much giuen to wine. Yet he wanne the victorie at that time, and there were diuerse of his fathers friends, that prayed him to doe them that honor, that they might keepe the feaste of this victorie in their houses. Phocion denied them all, but one man, and him he suffred to shew his good will vnto his house and went thither himselfe to supper to him. Where amongest many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweet smelling spices to wash the feete of the bidden guests as they came to the feast. Whereupon he called his son to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phocus, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victorie with excesse? but because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to SPARTA, and placed him there among young boyes brought vp after the LACONIAN discipline. The ATHENIANS were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne countrie maner and fashions. Also when Demades the orator one day sayd vnto Phocion, why do we not perswade the ATHENIANS to liue after the LACONIAN manner? As for me (sayd he if thou wilt make one to set it forward: I am ready to be the first man to moue the matter. Indeed q Phocion, thou art a meet man to perswade the ATHENIANS to liue LACONIAN like, in cõmon together at their meales, & to praise Lycurgus strait law: that art thy self cõmonly so perfumed, & fine in thy apparel. Another time when Alexãder writ letters vnto ATHENS to send him some ships, and that the Orators perswaded them not to grant him, the people called vpon Phocion chiefly to say his opinion: then Phociõ told thẽ plainly, me thinks ye must either make your selues the strongest in warres, or being the weaker, procure to be friends vnto the stronger. Pythias a new come orator, being full of tongue, and impudent, would still make one to speake in euery matter: Wherefore Phocion sayed to him, good gods, will this nouice neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenant of the prouince of BABYLON, fled out of ASIA, and came to ATTICA with a great summe of gold and siluer: straight these men that solde their tongues to the people for money, flocked about him like a sight of swallowes. And he stuck not to giue euery one of them a peece of money to baste them with for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion himselfe, he sent vnto him seuen hundreth talents, and offered himselfe and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe answer, and tolde him, that he would make him repent it, if he corrupted the citie of ATHENS in that manner. So Harpalus being amazed therewith, left him at that time, and went vnto them that had taken money of him. But shortly after, when the ATHENIANS sate in councell about him, he perceiued that those which had taken his money were shrunk from him, and that they did accuse him, where they should haue excused him, to bleere the world, that men should not suspect them they had bene corrupted: and that Phocion on the other side which had refused his money, hauing respect to the cõmon wealth, had also some regard to saue his life: he once more attempted all the waies he could to win him. Howbeit he found him so constant, that no money could carie the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendship with Chariles (Phocions sonne in lawe) he made him to be ill spoken of, and greatly suspected, because men saw that he trusted him in all things, and imployed him in all his affaires. As in committing to his trust the making of a sumptuous tombe for Pythonicè, the famous Curtisan that was dead, whom he loued, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking vpon him whereof was no lesse shame vnto Chariles, then the finishing thereof was disgrace vnto him. This tombe is sene vnto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workmanship thereof being nothing like neare the charge of

of thirtie talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Chariles, for the finishing of the same. Furthermore after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her vp. Afterwards also, Chariles being accused for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he besought his father in law Phocion, to help to ease him in his iudgment. But Phocion flatly denied him, and said: Chariles I took thee for my sonne in law, in al honest and iust causes only. Furthermore, when Aslepiades the son of Hipparchus, brought the first newes of the death of king Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleue him: for said he, if it were true, all the earth would smell of the sauor of his corse, Phocion then perceiuing the people began to be high minded, and sought innouation: he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got vp to the pulpit for orations, and cryed out that Aslepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it shalbe true also to morrow, and the next day after. And therfore my Maisters, be not too hasty, but thinke of it at better leisure, and set your affayres at a sure stay. When Leosthenes also by his practise had brought the citie of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES warre, and in skorne asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done vnto the common wealth soe many yeares together, as he had bene generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion answered him, no small good sayed he, for all my countrye men haue bene buryed at home in their owne graues. Another time also, Leosthenes speaking proudly and insolently vnto the people, Phocion one daye sayed vnto him: young man my friende, thy wordes are lyke vnto a Cypresse tree, which is high and greate, but beareth no fruite. Then Hyperides rising vppe, asked Phocion: when wilt thou then counsell the ATHENIANS to make warre? when I shall see young men sayed he not to forsake their ranckes, rich men liberall, and Orators leaue to robbe the common wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to see such a goodly greate armie as Leosthenes had leauied: and that they asked Phocion how he lyked it: A goodly armie, quoth he, for a furlong, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I doe not see the citie able to make any more money, nor more shippes, neither yet any more souldiers than these. The which proued true, as it fell out afterwardes: for at the first, Leosthenes did many notable exployts. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in such a hope and iolitie, that they made continuall feastes and sacrifices through the citie to thanke the goddes for these good newes. And there were some among them, that to take Phocion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wish that he had done all those things? yes indeed answered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counsell to haue done them. Another time also when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, good gods, sayd he, when shall we leaue off to ouercome? When Leosthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion shoulde be appoynted Captaine in his place, and that he would pacifie the warre: did thrust in a man of meane hauior, and vnknowen, that sayed in the assembly, that he was Phocions friend, and schoolefellowe, and therefore besought the people that they would spare Phocion, because they had not such another man as he, and that they would make Antiphilus Generall of their armie. The people were contented withall. But then Phocion stoode vppe, and sayed, that this man was neuer scholler with him, neither did he euer knowe him before that time: but nowe sayed he, from henceforth I will take thee for my friend, for thou hast giuen the people the best counsell for mee. The people notwithstanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion spake against it all he coulde. Thereupon his friendes bidding him beware of such speeches, howe he did offende the people, least they killled him: he answered them, they shall wrongfully put me to death quoth he, speaking for the benefitte of my countrie, but otherwise they shall haue reason for to doe it, if I speake to the contrarie. But when he sawe nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on still with their intent: then he commaunded the Herauld to proclayme by sound of trumper, that all Citizens from foureteene yeeres vnto threescore, able to carrie weapon, should presently vpon breaking vp of the assembly, arme themselues, and follow him with fiue dayes prouision for victuals. Then was there great sturre amongst them in the citie, and the olde men came and complained vnto him, for his ouer ſtraight commandement. He told them againe, I doe you no wrong: for I am foure ſcore my ſelfe, and yet will goe with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fonde deſire of warre. But when all the ſea coaſt was full of ſouldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other ſtrangers which were led by Micion their Captaine, that landed in the territorie of the village RHAMNVS, and ſpoyled the countrie thereabouts: then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuers taking vpon them the office of a Lieutenant, & going about to counſell him, ſome to lodge his camp vpon ſuch a hill, & others to ſend his horſmen to ſuch a place, and others to campe heere: O Hercules (q. he), how many Captains do I ſee, and how few ſouldiers? Afterwards when he had ſet his footmē in battel ray, there was one among them that left his ranck, & ſtepped out before them al. Therupon one of his enemies alſo made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe again to his place. Then ſaid Phocion vnto him: art thou not aſhamed yong lout to haue forſaken thy ranck twiſe? the one, where thy captain had placed thee, & the other in the which thou haddeſt placed thy ſelf? So Phocion giuing charge vpon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and ſlue Micion their Captain, with diuers others. Furthermore, the army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wan a battell of Antipater, & Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was ſlaine in the field, Antiphilus being generall of the footmen, & Menon THESSALIAN, Collonell of the horſmen. Shortly after Craterus cōming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great armie, they fought a battell by the citie of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were ouerthrowen: yet was not the ouerthrow nor ſlaughter great, although it came through the diſobedience of the ſoldiers to their captains, which were but yong men & vſed them ouer gently. Moreouer, when Antipater practiſed to make the cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and ſhamefully forſooke to defend their cōmon libertie: whereupon Antipater marched forthwith with his armie, to the citie of ATHENS. Demoſthenes & Hyperides vnderſtanding that, forſook the citie. Then Demades, that was in diſgrace & defamed for lack of payment of ſuch fines as were ſet vpon his head (being 7 ſeuerall times condemned, becauſe he had ſo many times moued matters contrary to the law) & could not therfore be ſuffered any more to ſpeake in the aſſembly, was then diſpenced withall, & licenſed to ſpeake: whereupon he moued the people to ſend ambaſſadors vnto Antipater, with ful cōmiſſion & authoritie to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans truſt this abſolute authoritie to treat of peace: they called for Phocion, ſaying that he only was to be truſted with the ambaſſade. Thē Phocion anſwered them: if you had beleued my former coūcels I alwaies gaue you, ſuch weighty matters ſhould not now haue troubled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by the people, Phocion was ſent ambaſſador vnto Antipater, that lay at the caſtle of Cadmea, being ready at that time to inuade the coūtry of ATTICA. Phocion firſt requeſted him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus preſently anſwered him: Phocion, thy requeſt is vnreaſonable, that lying here we ſhould eate out our frends, & deſtroy their country: when we may liue of our enemies, & enrich our ſelues with their ſpoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we muſt needs doe Phocion this pleaſure. And for the reſt, touching the capitulations of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS ſhould ſend them a blanck, & refer the conditions of peace to them: like as himſelf being beſieged in the citie LAMIA, had referred all capitulations and articles of peace, vnto the diſcretion of Leoſthenes their generall. So when Phocion was come backe to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS ſeing there was no remedie, were compelled to be contented with ſuch offer of peace, as the enemie made thē. Then Phocion was ſent back again to Antipater at THEBES, with other ambaſſadors ioyned in commiſſion with him: amongſt whom alſo was that famous Philoſopher Xenocrates. The eſtimatiō of his vertue was ſo great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing mā ſo proud, cruell, diſdainfull, nor haſty of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would ſoften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerſe nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the reſt, and would not once ſalute Xenocrates. Whereupon, ſome me say, that Xenocrates said then, Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a witnes of his discourtesie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates beganne to speake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end commaunded him to holde his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater answered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, so they deliuered him Demosthenes and Hyperides: that they should keep their ancient lawes and gouernment, that they should receiue a garrison into the hauen of Munychia, that they should defraye the charges of this warre, and also pay a ransome besides. All the other Ambassadours but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these conditions of peace, as very reasonable and fauorable: but he sayed that they were slaues, Antipater did handle them fauourably, but for free men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion besought him that he woulde yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is sayed) answered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, saue that which should vndoe thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater sayed not so, but asked him, if he would become suertie for the ATHENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrison. Phocion then holding his peace, & delaying answer, there was one Callimedon surnamed Carabos, (a bold man, and hated the libertie of the people) that spake forth in these wordes: if Phocion were so fonde to giue his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldest thou Antipater beleue him therefore, and leaue to doe that thou hast determined? Thus were the ATHENIANS, driuen to receiue the garrison of the MACEDONIANS of the which Menillus was Captaine, an honest man, and Phocions friend. This commandement to receiue the garrison within the hauen of Munychia, was found very stately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glorie to boast of his power: then for any profit could otherwise come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possessiō of the castle, he further increased their griefe: because the garrison entred the twentith day of Bœdromion (to wit, the month of August) on the which the feast day of their misteries was celebrated, at what time they make their procession called Iacchus, from the citie of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therfore the solemnitie of this holy feast being thus confused, many began to consider, that in old time when their realme did flourish, there were heard and sene voices and images of the gods on that day, which made the enemies both afraied, and amazed: and nowe in contrary manner in the very selfe same solemnitie of the goddes, they saw the greatest calamitie that could haue happened vnto GREECE. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yere through before, became then so prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and euent, that euer happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the losse of their libertie. For, not many yeres before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE vnto ATHENS: that they should looke well to the entries of Diana, that straungers shoulde not possesse them. And about that time also the couerings with the which they doe adorne the holy beddes of the mysteries, being wette with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yealowe and pale, as if it had bene the couering of a dead bodie. Yea, and that which was most to be wondred at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did without changing keepe their colour they had before. When one of the ministers of the temple also did wash a white pig in the sea in a cleane place, by the wharfe: there sodainly came a great fish that bytte at it, and caried the hinder partes of the pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured that the goddes did signifie vnto them, that they shoulde lose the lowest part of their cittie, nearest vnto the sea, and should keepe the highest partes thereof. This notwithstanding, the garrison did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, because of the honestie of their Captaine Menillus. Now there were aboue 12000 Citizens, that for their pouertie lost the benefit of their freedome of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, vnto whom it seemed that they offered great wrong and iniurie: and parte of them also went into THRACIA, where Antipater assigned them townes and landes to inhabit. They seemed to be menne like vnto them, that had bene taken by assaulte, or by seege within a citie, which had bene compelled to forsake their countrie. Furthermore, the shamefull death of Demosthenes in the Ile of CALAVRIA, and of Hy-

PERIDES, by the citie of CLEONES, (whereof we haue written heretofore) were almost occasion giuen them to lament the times of the raigne of king Philip and Alexander. As it is reported that when Antigonus was slaine, they that had ouercome him, were so cruell vnto their subiects: that a laborer in the countrie of PHRYGIA digging the earth, being asked what he sought for, answered sighing: I seeke for Antigonus. Then many men began to say as much, when they remembred the noble mindes of those two Princes, how merciful they were to pardon in their anger, forgetting their displeasure: not like vnto Antipater, who craftily cloaked his tyrannicall power, which he vsurped, by being familiar, going simply apparelled, and faring meanely: and yet shewed himselfe notwithstanding a most cruell Lorde and tirant vnto them whom he had ouercome. Neuertheless Phocion obtained of him the restoring againe of diuerse men, whom he had banished: and those whom he could not get to be restored, yet he procured that they should not be banished into so farre countries, as others which had bene sent beyond the Mountaines Acroceraunians, and the head of Tænarus out of GREECE, but that they had libertie to remaine within the countrie of PELOPONNESVS: among the which was one Agnonides a Sycophant, and false accuser. Furthermore, he gouerned them that remained in ATHENS with great iustice and lenitie, and such as he knew to be good men and quiet, them he alwayes preferred to some offices: but such as he sawe were fantasticall people, and desirous of change, he kept them from office, and tooke all occasion from them, so that they vanished away of themselues, and learned in time to loue the countrie, and to followe tillage. When he sawe Xenocrates also paye a certen pension or tribute to the common wealth, which all strangers dwelling in ATHENS did vse yearely to paye: he would haue made him a freeman, and offered to put his name amongst the number of free Cittizens. But Xenocrates refused it, saying he would haue no part of that freedom, for the hinderance whereof, he had bene sent Ambassador. And when Menyllus had sent Phocion money, he made him answer: that Menyllus was no greater Lord then Alexander had bene, neither had he at that time any greater occasion to receiue his present, then when he had refused King Alexanders gifte. Menyllus replying againe, sayd that if he had no neede of it for himselfe, yet he might let his sone Phocus haue it. But Phocion answered: if my sonne Phocus will leaue his naughtie life, and become an honest man, that which I will leaue him, shall serue his turne very well: but if it be so that he will still holde on the course he hath taken, there is no riches then that can suffice him. Another time also he answered Antipater more roundly, when he would haue had him done an vnhonest thing: Antipater, sayed he, cannot haue me to be his friend, and flatterer both. Antipater, who was wont to saye, that he had two friendes at ATHENS, Phocion and Demades: of the which he could neuer make the one to take any thing of him, and the other, he could neuer satisfie him. And truly Phocions pouertie was a great glorie vnto his vertue, sithence he was growen olde, continuing in the same, after he had bene so many times generall of the ATHENIANS, and had receiued such friendship and courtesie of so many Kings and Princes. Where Demades to the contrarie delighted to shew his riches, in things that were contrarie to the lawes of the citie. For, a decree being made at ATHENS, commaunding that no stranger, vpon forfeiture of a thousand Drachmas to be payed by the defrayer of the daunces of the citie, should be any of the Dauncers that Daunced at any common plaies or sportes: Demades one day making certen games and sportes at his owne charges, brought a hundreth Dauncers of strangers at one time, and withall, brought also a hundreth thousand Drachmas to pay the forfeiture thereof. Another time, when he married his sonne Demas, he sayed vnto him: sonne, when I married thy mother there was no small roste, that my next neighbour knewe not of it: where nowe at thy mariage, Kings and Princes are at the charge of the feast. Furthermore, when the ATHENIANS were importunate with Phocion to goe vnto Antipater, to intreat him to take his garrison out of their citie: he stil refused the ambassade either because he had no hope to obtaine it, or for that he saw the people more obedient vnto reason, for feare of the garrison. Howbeit, he obtained of Antipater, that he should not be too hastye in the demaunding of his money, but shoulde deferre it vntill a further time. So the ATHENIANS perceiuing they could do no good with Phocion, they intreated Demades, who willingly tooke the

the matter vpon him, and went with his ſonne into MACEDON, whither doubtleſſe his deſtinie caried him to his vtter deſtruction, euen at that very time when Antipater was fallen ſicke of a diſeaſe whereof he dyed: whereby the affaires of the Realme went through the hands of Caſſander his ſonne, who had intercepted a letter of this Demades, which he had ſent vnto Antigonus in ASIA, willing him to come in all poſſible ſpeede to win GREECE and MACEDON, which hung but of an old rottē threed, mocking Antipater in this maner. Wherfore Caſſander being aduertiſed of his arriuall, he made him preſently to be apprehended, & ſetting his ſonne hard by him, ſlew him before his father, ſo neere him, that the bloud of his ſonne ſprang vpon him: ſo that the father was all bloudied with the murther of his ſonne. Then Caſſander caſting in Demades teeth his ingratitude, and trecherous treaſon againſt his father, giuing him all the reproachfull words he could deuiſe: at the length he ſlew him with his own hands. Now Antipater before his death, had eſtabliſhed Polyperchon Generall of the army of the MACEDONIANS, & Caſſander his ſonne only Colonell of a thouſand footemen. He notwithſtanding, after his fathers deceaſe, taking vpon him the gouernment of the realme: ſent Nicanor with ſpeede to ſucceede Menillus in the Captaineſhip of the garriſon of ATHENS, before his death ſhould be reuealed, commaunding him firſt in any caſe, to take the caſtle of Munychia, which hee did. Shortly after, the ATHENIANS vnderſtanding of the death of Antipater, they accuſed Phocion for that he had knowen of his death long before, and yet kept it ſecret to pleaſe Nicanor. But Phocion regarded not this accuſation, but fell in acquaintance notwithſtanding with Nicanor: whō he handled ſo wiſely, that he made him not only friendly vnto the ATHENIANS but furthermore perſwaded him to be at ſome charge to giue the people the paſtime of common playes, which he made to be done at his coſt. In the meane time, Polyperchon, who had the gouernment of the kings perſon, meaning to giue Caſſander a ſlampant and blurt, he ſent letters pattentes vnto the people at ATHENS, declaring how the young king did reſtore vnto them their popular ſtate againe, and commaunded that all the ATHENIANS ſhould vſe their former ancient lawes of their citie. This was a wile and crafty fetch againſt Phocion. For Polyperchon deuiſing this practiſe to get the city of ATHENS into his hands (as it fell out afterwards by proofe) had no hope to obtaine his purpoſe, vnleſſe he found meanes firſt to baniſh Phocion: and thought that he ſhould eaſily bring that to paſſe, when ſuch as had before beene put off their freedome, by his meanes, ſhould come againe to haue voices in the aſſembly, & that the ſeditious Orators and accuſers might be turned at liberty againe, to ſay what they would. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the contentes of theſe letters pattentes, beganne to be ſomewhat quickned and moued withall: whereupon Nicanor deſiring to ſpeake with the ATHENIANS in their Senate, which was aſſembled in the hauen of Piræa: he went and hazarded his perſon amongſt them, vpon Phocions faith and word. Dercyllus Captaine for the king, being ſecretly aduertiſed thereof, and in the field, not farre from the citie, did what he could to take Nicanor: but Nicanor hauing warning of it in time, ſaued himſelfe. Then it appeared, that Nicanor would preſently be reuenged of the citie, and they accuſed Phocion becauſe he kept him not, but did let him goe. Whereunto he anſwered: that he truſted Nicanors worde, and that he did not thinke he would offer the citie any hurt, but if it ſhould fal out otherwiſe, he had rather the world ſhould knowe, that he had the wrong offred him, then that he ſhould offer any. This truely appeared to be nobly ſpoken, in reſpect of himſelfe. But conſidering that he being then Generall, did thereby hazard the ſafetie of his countrie: I can not tell whether he did not breake a greater faith which he ought to haue had to the ſafetie of his countriemen. Neither could he alſo alleage for his excuſe, that hee did not lay handes on Nicanor, for feare to bring the citie into manifeſt warre: but that for a colour he did preferre the faith which he had ſworne and promiſed vnto him, and the iuſtice that he would obſerue in his behalfe: that for his ſake, Nicanor ſhould afterwardes keepe himſelfe in peace, and doe no hurt to the ATHENIANS. Howbeit in truth it ſeemed, that nothing deceiued Phocion: but by the ouer truſt hee had in this Nicanor. The which ſeemeth to be ſo, becauſe when diuers came to him to complaine of Nicanor, that he ſought all the ſecret meanes he could to ſurpriſe the hauen of Piræa, and that he daily paſſed ouer ſouldiers in the Ile of SALAMINA, and practiſed to bribe certaine of the inhabitants within the precinct of the hauen: he would neuer heare of it, and much leſſe beleeue it. Furthermore, when Philomedes LAMBRIAN made a motion, that the ATHENIANS ſhould prepare to be in readines to waite vpon their Captaine Phocion, to do as he commaunded them: he made no account of it, vntill he ſaw Nicanor come out with his ſouldiers from the fort of Munychia, and that he beganne to caſt trenches to compaſſe in the hauen of Piræa. But then, when Phocion thought to lead out the people to preuent him: he found they mutined againſt him, and no man would obey his commandement. In the meane time, Alexander the ſonne of Polyperchon came with an armie, pretending to aide them of the citie againſt Nicanor, where in deede he ment (if he could) to get the reſt of the citie into his hands, then ſpecially, when they were in greateſt broile one againſt an other, and the rather, becauſe the baniſhed men entred hand ouer head with him, and diuerſe ſtraungers alſo, and other defamed men: ſo that there was a confuſed councell and aſſembly of Omnigatherum kept within the citie, without any order, in the which Phocion was depriued of his office of Generall, and others were alſo choſen Captaines in his place. And had they not ſeene this Alexander talking alone with Nicanor, and returning many times hard to the walles of the citie, which made the ATHENIANS affraid and miſtruſtfull: they had neuer ſaued it from taking. At that time Phocion was preſently accuſed of treaſon by the Orator Agnonides: the which Callimedon and Pericles fearing got them out of the citie betimes. And Phocion alſo with his friendes that were not fled, went vnto Polyperchon: with whom alſo Solon PLATÆIAN, and Dinarchus CORINTHIAN, went for company, who thought to haue found friendſhip and familiarity with Polyperchon. Howbeit Dinarchus falling ſicke by the way, in the citie of ELATIA, they ſtayed there many daies, hoping of his recouerie. But in the meane time, the people at the perſwaſion of the Orator Agnonides, and at the requeſt of Archeſtratus, ſtabliſhed a decree, to ſende Ambaſſadors vnto Polyperchon, to accuſe Phocion: inſomuch as both parties met at one ſelfe time, & found him in the field with the king about a village of the country of PHOCIDE, called PHARYGES, ſtanding at the foote of the mountaine Acrorion, which they ſurname alſo Galaten. There Polyperchon commaunded a cloth of gold to be ſet vp, and cauſed the king to be ſet vnder the ſame, and all his chiefeſt friends about him. But to beginne withall, he made Dinarchus to be taken, and commaunded them to put him to death after they had racked him: then he willed the ATHENIANS to tell what they had to ſay. Then they beganne to quarrell, and to be loud one with an other, accuſing one an other in the preſence of the king and his councell: vntill Agnonides at length ſtepped forth, and ſaid: my Lords of MACEDON, put vs all in priſon, and then ſende vs bound handes and feete to ATHENS, to giue account of our doings. The king laughed to heare him ſay ſo. But the noble men of MACEDON that were preſent then, and diuerſe ſtrangers beſides to heare their complaints: made ſigne to the Ambaſſadors to vtter their accuſations before the king, rather then to referre them to the hearing of the people at ATHENS. Howbeit both parties had not alike indifferent hearing: for Polyperchon checked vp Phocion oftentimes, and did ſtill cut off his tale, as he thought to purge him ſelfe: inſomuch as in anger, he beat his ſtaffe he had in his hand againſt the ground, and commaunded him at length to hold his peace, & to get him thence. And when Hegemon alſo told Polyperchon, that he himſelfe could beſt witneſſe, how Phocion had alwaies faithfully ſerued and loued the people: he angrily aunſwered him, come not hither to lie falſly vpon me, in the preſence of the king. Therewith the king roſe out of his ſeate, and tooke a ſpeare in his hand, thinking to haue killed Hegemon: had not Polyperchon ſodainly embraced him behind, and ſtayed him. So the councell roſe, and brake vp, but preſently Phocion was apprehended, and they that ſtood by him. Certaine of his friendes ſeeing that, which ſtood further off, muffeled their faces, and ſtraight conueyed themſelues away. The reſt were ſent priſoners to ATHENS by Clitus, not ſo much to haue their cauſes heard there, as to haue them executed for condemned men. Furthermore, the manner of the carying of them to ATHENS was ſhamefull. For they were caried vpon cartes through the great ſtreete Ceramicum, vnto the Theater: where Clitus kept them, vntill the Senate had aſſembled the people, excepting no bondman, no ſtraunger, nor defamed perſon out of this aſſembly, but left the Theater wide open to all comers in whatſoeuer they were, and the pulpit for Orations free for euery man that would ſpeake againſt them. So firſt of all, the kings letters were read openly, by the which he did did aduertise the people, that he had found these offendors conuicted of treason: notwithstanding, that he referred the sentence of their condemnation vnto them, for that they were free men. Then Clitus brought his prisoners before the people, where the noble men when they saw Phocion, were ashamed, and hiding their faces, wept to see him. Howbeit, there was one that rose vp and saide: my Lordes sith the king referreth the iudgement of so great persons vnto the people, it were great reason all the bondmen and strangers which are no free citizens of ATHENS, should be taken out of this assembly. The people would not agree to it, but cried out, that such traitors should be stoned to death, that fauour the authority of a few, and are enemies of the people: whereupon silence was made, and no man durst speake any more for Phocion. Neuertheless when Phocion with much a doe had obtained audience, hee asked them: my Lordes, will ye iustly or wrongfully put vs to death? Some answered him: iustly. How then can ye do it, quoth he, that will not heare our iustifications? Yet could they not be heard for all this. Then Phocion comming neerer, saide vnto them. For my selfe, my Lordes, I confesse I haue done you wrong, & haue in gouernment committed faults deseruing death: but for these prisoners with mee, what haue they done why you should put them to death? The common people answered him: because they are thy friendes. With this answere Phocion departed, and spake neuer a word more. Then the Orator Agnonides holding a decree in his hand readie written, read it openly to the people, declaring how they should be iudged by voyces, whether the offendors had deserued death or not: & if it were found they had, then that they should all be put to death. And there were that when this decree was red, cried out, that they should adde further vnto the decree, that before Phocion should be put to death, they should first torment him: and therewithall commandement was giuen that the wheele should be sette vp to breake his ioynts vpon it, and also that the hangman should be sent for. But then Agnonides perceiuing that Clitus was offended with it, and thinking besides it were too beastly and barbarous a part to vse him in that sort, he saide openly: my Lordes, when you shall haue such a varlet in your handes at Callimedon, then you may cast him on the wheele: but against Phocion, I would not wish such crueltie. Then rose vp a noble man among them, and added to his words: thou hast reason to say so, Agnonides: for if Phocion should be laid on the wheele, what should we then doe with thee? The decree being confirmed according to the contentes thereof, iudgement was giuen by voices of the people, no man sitting but all standing vp, and most of them with garlandes on their heades, for the ioy they had to condemne these prisoners to death. With Phocion there were condemned, Nicocles, Thudippus, Hegemon, and Pythocles: but Demetrius PHALERIAN, Callimedon & Charitles were also in their absence condemned to die. Now when the assembly was broken vp, and that the persons condemned were carried backe to prison, from thence to be conueighed to execution: others imbracing their friends, and taking their last leaue of them as they went, wept, and lamented their cursed fortune. But Phocion looking as cheerefully of it as he was wont to doe being Generall, when they honorably waited on him to his house from the assembly: he made many of them pitie him in their hearts to consider his constancie and noble courage. On the other side also, there were many of his enemies that came as neere vnto him as they could, to reuile him, amongst whom there was one that stepped before him, and did spit in his face. Then Phocion turning him vnto the Magistrates, saide: will ye not cause this impudent fellow to leaue his rayling? When they were in prison, Thudippus seeing the hemlocke which they brayed in a morter to giue them to drinke: he beganne desperately to curse and banne, saying, that they wrongfully put him to death with Phocion. Why, said Phocion againe: and doest thou not rather reioyce to die with me? When one that stoode by asked Phocion, if he would any thing to his sonne Nicocles: yes, quoth he, that I will: bid him neuer reuenge the wrong the ATHENIANS do me. Then Nicocles one of Phocions dearest friends, prayed him to let him drinke the poyson before him. Phocion answered him, thy request is grieuous to me, Nicocles: but because I neuer denyed thee any thing in my life, I will also grant thee this at my death. When al the rest had drunke, there was no more poyson left, and the hangman saide he would make no more vnlesse they gaue him twelue Drachmas, for so much the pound did cost him. Phocion perceiuing then that the hangman delayed time, he called one of his friends vnto him, and prayed him to giue the hangman that litle money he demaunded, ſith a man can not die at ATHENS for nothing without coſt. It was the nineteenth day of the moneth of Munichion, (to wit, March) on which day the Knights were wont to make a ſolemne proceſſion in the honour of Iupiter: howbeit ſome of them left off the garlands of flowers which they ſhould haue worn on their heads, and others alſo looking towards the priſon dore as they went by, burſt out a weeping. For, they whoſe hearts were not altogether hardned with cruelty, & whoſe iudgements were not wholly ſuppreſſed with enuie, thought it a grieuous ſacriledge againſt the goddes, that they did not let that day paſſe, but that they did defile ſo ſolemne a feaſt, with the violent death of a man. His enemies notwithſtanding, continuing ſtill their anger againſt him, made the people paſſe a decree, that his bodie ſhould be baniſhed, and caried out of the boundes of the country of ATTICA, forbidding the ATHENIANS that no fire ſhould be made for the ſolemniſing of his funerals. For this reſpect no friend of his durſt once touch his bodie. Howbeit a poore man called Conopion, that was wont to get his liuing that way, being hyred for money to burne mens bodies: he tooke his corſe, and caried it beyond the citie of ELEVSIN, and getting fire out of a womans houſe of MEGARA, he ſolemniſed his funerals. Furthermore, there was a gentlewoman of MEGARA, who comming by chaunce that way, with her gentlewomen, where his bodie was but newly burnt: ſhe cauſed the earth to be caſt vp a litle where the bodie was burnt, and made it like to a hollow tombe, wherupon ſhe did vſe ſuch ſprinckling and effuſions, as are commonly done at the funerals of the dead: and then taking vp his bones in her lappe in the night, ſhe brought them home, and buried them in her harth, ſaying: O deare harth, to thee I bequeath the reliques of this noble and good man, and pray thee to kepe them faithfully, to bring them one day to the graue of his auncеſters, when the ATHENIANS ſhall come to confeſſe the fault & wrong they haue done vnto him. And truly it was not long after, that the ATHENIANS found by the vntowardnes of their affaires, that they had put him to death, who only maintained iuſtice, and honeſtie at ATHENS. Whereupon they made his image to be ſet vp in braſſe, and gaue honorable buriall to his bones, at the charges of the citie. And for his accuſers, they condemned Agnonides of treaſon, and put him to death themſelues. The other two, Epicurus and Demophilus being fled out of the citie, were afterwards met with by his ſonne Phocus, who was reuenged of them. This Phocus as men report, was otherwiſe no great good man, who fancying a young maide which a bawde kept, comming by chance one day into the ſchoole of Lycæum, he heard Theodorus the Atheiſt (to wit, that beleeued not there were any goddes) make this argument. If it be no ſhame, ſaid he, to deliuer a mans friend from bondage, no more ſhame is it to redeeme his leman which he loueth: euen ſo it is all one to redeeme a mans leman, as his friend. This young man taking this argument to ſerue his turne, beleeuing that he might lawfully do it, got the young maide he loued from the baude. Furthermore, this death of Phocion did alſo reuiue the lamentable death of Socrates vnto the GRECIANS: for men thought that it was a like hainous offence and calamitie vnto the citie of ATHENS.

Cato Vtican.

THe family and house of Cato, tooke his first glory & name of his great grandfather, Cato the Censor: who for his vertue (as we haue declared in his life) was one of the famousest and worthiest men of ROME in his time. This Cato whom we now write of, was left an orphan by his father and mother, with his brother Capio, and Porcia his sister. Seruilia was also Catoes halfe sister, by his mothers side. All these were brought vp with their vncle Liuius Drusus, at that time the greatest man of the citie: for he was passing eloquent, and very honest, and of as great a courage besides, as any other ROMAINE. Men report, that Cato from his childhood shewed himselfe both in word and countenance, and also in all his pastimes and recreations, verie constant and stable. For he would goe through with that he tooke vpon him to doe, and would force himselfe aboue his strength: and as he could not away with flatterers, so was he rough with them that went about to threaten him. He would hardly laugh, and yet had euer a pleasant countenance. He was not chollericke, nor easie to be angred: but when the bloud was vp, he was hardly pacified. When he was first put to schoole, he was very dull of vnderstanding, and slow to learne: but when he had once learned it, he would neuer forget it, as all men else commonly doe. For such as are quicke of conceite, haue commonly the worst memories: and contrarily, they that are hard to learne, doe keepe that better which they haue learned. For euery kinde of learning is a motion and quickening of the minde. He seemed besides not to be light of credite, & that may be some cause of his slowneſse in conceite. For truely he suffereth somewhat that learneth, and thereof it commeth, that they that haue least reason to resist, are those which doe giue lightest credite. For young men are easilier perswaded then old men, and the sicke then the whole. And where a man hath least reason for his doubts: there he is sooneſt brought to beleeue any thing. This notwithstanding, it is reported that Cato was obedient vnto his schoolemaister, and would doe what he commaunded him: howbeit he would aske him still the cause and reason of euery thing. In deede his schoolemaister was very gentle, and readier to teach him, then to strike him with his fist. His name was Sarpedo. Furthermore, when Cato was but a young boy, the people of ITALY which were confederates of the ROMAINES, sued to be made free citizens of ROME. At that time it chaunced one Pompedius Silo, a valiant souldier, and of great estimation among the confederates of the ROMAINES, and a great friend beſides of Druſus: to be lodged many daies at his houſe. He in this time falling acquainted with theſe young boyes, ſaid one day vnto them: good boyes, intreate your vncle to ſpeake for vs, that we may be made free citizens of ROME. Cepio ſmiling nodded with his head, that he would. But Cato making no anſwere, looked very wiſely vpon the ſtrangers that lay in the houſe. Then Pompedius taking him aſide, asked him: and thou, my pretie boy, what ſayeſt thou to it? Wilt thou not pray thine vncle as well as thy brother, to be good to his gueſtes? Cato ſtill held his peace and aunſwered nothing, but ſhewed by his ſilence and looke, that he would not heare their requeſt. Then Pompedius taking him vp in his armes, did put him out of the window, as if he would haue let him haue gone: and ſpeaking more ſharply to him then he did before, he caſt him many times out of his armes without the window, and ſaid, promiſe vs then, or elſe I will let thee fall. But Cato abid it a long time, and neuer quinched for it, nor ſhewed countenance of feare. Thereupon Pompedius ſetting him downe againe, told his friends that ſtood by him: O what good happe doth this child promiſe one day vnto ITALIE, if he liue? ſure if he were a man, I beleeue we ſhould not haue one voice of all the people of our ſide. An other time, there were ſome of Catoes neere kinſemen, that keeping the feaſt day of his birth, bad many young boyes to ſupper, and amongſt others this Cato. The boyes to occupie themſelues till ſupper was readie, gathered themſelues together great and ſmall, into ſome priuate place of the houſe. Their play was, counterfaiting pleadings before the iudges, accuſing one an other, and carying them that were condemned to priſon. Amongſt them, a goodly young boy was caried by a bigger boy into a litle chamber, bounde as a condemned perſon. The boy perceiuing he was locked vp, cryed out vnto Cato: who miſtruſting what it was, went ſtraight to the chamber dore & putting them by by force that withſtood him to come vnto it, he tooke out the young boy, and caried him very angrily with him to his owne houſe, and all the other young boyes followed him alſo. So Cato had ſuch name among the young boyes, that when Sylla made the game of young boyes running a horſebacke, which the ROMAINES call Troia: to appoint them before that they might be ready at the day of the ſhew, he hauing gotten all the young boyes of noble houſes together, appointed them two Captaines. Of them, the boyes tooke the one, becauſe of his mother Metella, which was the wife of Sylla: but they would none of the other called Sextus, who was nephew to Pompey the great, neither would they be exerciſed vnder him, nor followe him. Wherefore Sylla asked them, which of them they would haue: they all cryed then Cato, and Sextus himſelfe did willingly giue him the honor, as the worthier of both. Sylla was their fathers friend, and therefore did ſend for them many times to come vnto him, & he would talke with them: the which kindnes he ſhewed to few men, for the maieſtie and great authoritie he had. Serpedo alſo (Catoes ſchoolemaiſter) thinking it a great preferrement and ſafetie for his ſchollers, did commonly bring Cato vnto Syllaes houſe, to waite vpon him: the which was rather like vnto a iayle or priſon, for the great number of priſoners which were daily brought thither, and put to death. Cato being then but foureteene yeares of age, and perceiuing that there were many heads brought which were ſaied to be of great men, and that euerie bodie ſighed and mourned to ſee them: he asked his ſchoolemaſter, how it was poſſible the tyrant ſcaped, that ſome one or other killed him not? Becauſe, q̃ Serpedo, that all men feare him, more then they hate him. Why then, replyed Cato againe, diddeſt thou not giue me a ſword that I might kill him, to deliuer my country of this ſlauery & bondage? Serpedo hearing the boy ſay ſo, and ſeeing his countenance and eyes on fire with choller, he maruelled much at it, and afterwardes had a very good eye vnto him, leaſt raſhly he ſhould attempt ſome thing againſt Sylla. When he was but a litle boy, ſome asked him whom he loued beſt? My brother, ſaide he. Then the other continuing ſtil to aske him, & who next: he anſwered likewiſe, his brother. Then the third time againe, likewiſe his brother. Till at length he that asked him, was weary with asking him ſo oft. Yea and when he was come of age alſo, he then confirmed the loue he bare to his brother in his deedes. For twenty yeares together he neuer ſupped without his brother Cæpio, neither went he euer out of his houſe into the market place, nor into the fields without him: but when his brother did noint himſelfe with ſweete oyles of perfume, he would none of that, and in all things elſe, he led a ſtraight and hard life. So that his brother

Cato being commended of euery man for his temperaunce, honesty, and sober life: he graunted in deede that in respect of others, he led a sober and temperate life: but when I doe (sayed he) compare my life with my brother Catoes, me thinkes then there is no difference betwixt me and Sippius. This Sippius was at that time noted and pointed at, for his fine and curious effeminate life. After that Cato was once chosen Apolloes Priest, he went from his brother, and tooke his portion of the goods of his father, which amounted to the summe of a hundred and twenty talents. Then he liued more hardly then hee did before. For he fell in acquaintaunce with Antipater TYRIAM, a Stoicke Philosopher, and gaue him selfe chiefly vnto the studie of morall and ciuill Philosophy, imbracing all exercise of vertue with such an earnest desire, that it seemed he was prickt forward by some god: but aboue all other vertues, he loued the sincerity of iustice, which he would not wrest for any gift nor fauor. He studied also to be eloquent, that he might speake openly before the people, because he would there should be certaine warlike forces entertained in ciuill Philosophy, as also in a great city. Notwithstanding, he would not exercise it before any body, neither would he euer haue any man to heare him speake when he did learne to speake. For when one of his friends told him one day, that men did mislike he spake so litle in company: it skilleth no matter, (q) he, so they can not reproue my life, for I will beginne to speake, when I can say some thing worthy to be spoken. Hard by the market place there was the common pallace or towne house of the citie, called Basilica Porcia, the which Porcius Cato the elder had built, in the time of his Censorship. There the Tribunes were wont to keepe their audience: and because there was a piller that troubled their sights, they would either haue taken it away, or else haue set it in some other place. That was the first cause that made Cato against his will to goe into the market place, and to get vp into the pulpit for orations, to speake against them: where hauing giuen this first proofe of his eloquence and noble minde, he was maruellously esteemed of. For his oration was not like a young man, counterfeating fineness of speach and affectation, but stout, full of wit and vehemency: and yet in the shortnesse of his sentences, he had such an excellent grace withall, that he maruellously delighted the hearers: and furthermore, shewing in nature a certaine grauity besides, it did so please them, that he made them laugh. Hee had a very full and audible voyce that might be heard of a maruellous number of people, and such a strong nature besides, that he neuer fainted, nor brake his speach: for many times hee would speake a whole day together, and was neuer wearie. So when he had obtained his cause against the Tribunes, he returned againe to keepe his former great silence, and to harden his body with painefull exercises, as to abide heate, frost, and snow bare headed, and alwayes to goe a foote in the fielde, where his friends that did accompany him rode a horseback, and sometime hee would come and talke with one, sometime with an other, as he went a foote by them. He had a wonderfull patience also in his sickenesse. For when he had any ague, he would be alone all day long, and suffer no man to come and see him, vntill he perceiued his fit was off him, and that he founde he was better. When he supped with his friendes and familiars, they drew lots who should choose their parts. If he chaunced not to choose, his friendes notwithstanding gaue him the preferment to choose: but he refused it, saying it was no reason, sith the goddesse Venus was against him. At the first he did not vse to sitte long at the table, but after he had drunke one draught onely, he would straight rise. But when he came to be elder, he sate long at the table: so that oftentimes he would sit it out all night with his friendes, till the next morning. But they seeking to excuse it, sayed, that his great businesse and affaires in the common wealth was the cause of it. For following that all the day long, hauing no leysure nor time to studie when night came, he delighted to talke with learned men, and Philosophers, at the bord. Wherefore when Memmius on a time being in company, sayed, that Cato did nothing but drinke all night: Cicero taking his tale out of his mouth, aunswered him, thou doest not adde this vnto it, that all the daie he doth nothing but plaie at dise. To be short, Cato thinking that the manners and fashions of mens liues in his time were so corrupt, and required such great chaunge and alteration: that to goe vprightly, he was to take a contrary course in all things. For hee saw that purple, red, and the lightest colours were best esteemed of: he in contrary manner determined to weare blacke. And many times also after dinner hee would goe abroade bare footed
